

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. BY THE QUEEN.

A PROCLAMATION,

For dissolving the present Parliament, and declaring the Calling of another.

VICTORIA R.

WHEREAS We have thought fit, by and with the Advice of Our Privy Council, to dissolve this present Parliament, which stands prorogued to Thursday the Twenty-sixth Day of November instant: We do, for that End, publish this Our Royal Proclamation, and do hereby dissolve the said Parliament accordingly: And the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, and the Commissioners for Shires and Burghs, of the House of Commons, are discharged from their Meeting and Attendance on the said Thursday the Twenty-sixth Day of November instant: And We, being desirous and resolved, as soon as may be, to meet Our People, and to have their Advice in Parliament, do hereby make known to all Our loving Subjects Our Royal Will and Pleasure to call a new Parliament: And do hereby further declare, that, with the Advice of Our Privy Council, We have given Order that Our Chancellor of that Part of Our United Kingdom called Great Britain and Our Chancellor of Ireland do respectively, upon Notice thereof, forthwith issue out Writs, in due Form and according to Law, for calling a new Parliament. And We do hereby also, by this Our Royal Proclamation under Our Great Seal of Our United Kingdom, require Writs forthwith to be issued accordingly by Our said Chancellors respectively, for causing the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, who are to serve in the said Parliament, to be duly returned to, and give their Attendance in, Our said Parliament; which Writs are to be returnable on Thursday the Tenth Day of December next.

Given at Our Court at Windsor, this Eleventh Day of November, in the Year of Our Lord One thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, and in the Thirty-second Year of Our Reign.

GOD SAVE THE QUEEN.

BY THE QUEEN.
A PROCLAMATION,

In Order to the Electing and Summoning the Sixteen Peers of Scotland.

VICTORIA R.

WHEREAS We have in Our Council thought fit to declare Our Pleasure for summoning and holding a Parliament of Our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland on Thursday the Tenth Day of December next ensuing the date hereof: In order therefore to the electing and summoning the Sixteen Peers of Scotland who are to sit in the House of Peers in the said Parliament, We do, by the Advice of Our Privy Council, issue forth this Our Royal Proclamation, strictly charging and commanding all the Peers of Scotland to assemble and meet at Holyrood House, in Edinburgh, on Thursday, the Third Day of December next, between the Hours of Twelve and Two in the Afternoon, to nominate and choose the Sixteen Peers to sit and vote in the House of Peers in the said ensuing Parliament by open Election and Plurality of Voices of the Peers that shall be then present, and of the Proxies of such as shall be absent (such Proxies being Peers, and producing a Mandate in Writing duly signed before Witnesses, and both the Constituent and Proxy being qualified according to Law); and the Lord Clerk Register, or such Two of the Principal Clerks of the Session as shall be appointed by him to officiate in his Name, are hereby respectively required to attend such Meeting, and to administer the Oaths required by Law to be taken there by the said Peers, and to take their Votes, and immediately after such Election made and duly examined to certify the Names of the Sixteen Peers so elected, and to sign and attest the same in the Presence of the said Peers the Electors, and return such Certificate into Our High Court of Chancery of Great Britain: And We do, by this Our Royal Proclamation, strictly command and require the Provost of Edinburgh, and all other the Magistrates of the said City, to take especial Care to preserve the Peace thereof during the time of the said Election, and to prevent all manner of Riots, Tumults, Disorders, and Violence whatsoever: And We strictly charge and command that this Our Royal Proclamation be duly published at the Market Cross at Edinburgh, and in all the County Towns of Scotland, Ten Days at least before the Time hereby appointed for the meeting of the said Peers to proceed to such Election.

Witness Ourselves at Windsor, this Eleventh Day of November, One thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, and in the Thirty-second Year of Our Reign.

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, IN THE
FIRST SESSION OF THE TWENTIETH PARLIAMENT OF THE
APPOINTED TO MEET 10 DECEMBER, 1868, IN THE THIRTY-SECOND YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 10th December, 1868.

THE NINETEENTH PARLIAMENT of the United Kingdom, which had been prorogued successively from the 31st day of July, 1868, to the 8th day of October; thence to the 26th day of November; was dissolved by Proclamation on the 11th day of November: by which Proclamation, also, new Writs were ordered to be issued for the calling a new Parliament; which Writs were made returnable on Thursday the 10th day of December; on which day it met for Despatch of Business.

THE PARLIAMENT was opened by Commission.

The HOUSE of PEERS being met,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House,

"That Her Majesty, not thinking fit to be personally present here this day,

VOL. CXCIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

has been pleased to cause a Commission to be issued under the Great Seal, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament."

Then Five of the Lords Commissioners, namely—The LORD CHANCELLOR, The LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl de Grey and Ripon), The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Earl of Kimberley), The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Viscount Sydney), and The Marquess of Ailesbury (The MASTER OF THE HORSE), being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House, to hear the Commission read."

Who being come;

The LORD CHANCELLOR said—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"Her Majesty not thinking fit to be present here this day in Her Royal Person, hath been pleased, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament, to cause Letters Patent to be issued under Her Great Seal, constituting us and several other Lords therein named Her Commissioners, to do all things, in Her Majesty's name, on Her part necessary to be performed in this Parliament: This will more fully appear by the Letters Patent themselves, which must now be read."

Then the said Letters Patent were read by the Clerk. And then

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"We have it in command from Her Majesty to let you know, That as soon as the Members of both Houses shall be sworn, the Causes of Her Majesty's calling this Parliament will be declared to you; and it being necessary a Speaker of the House of Commons should be first chosen, it is Her Majesty's Pleasure that you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, repair to the Place where you are to sit, and there proceed to the Choice of some proper Person to be your Speaker; and that you present such Person, whom you shall so choose, here, To-morrow, at two o'clock, for Her Majesty's Royal Approbation."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

PRAYERS.

ROLL OF THE LORDS—Garter King of Arms attending, delivered at the Table (in the usual Manner) a List of the Lords Temporal in the First Session of the Twentieth Parliament of the United Kingdom: The same was Ordered to lie on the Table.

Certificate of the Election of Fifteen Representative Peers for Scotland, certifying also with respect to the Sixteenth Peer that the Votes for The Earl of Kellie and The Lord Rollo were equal—Delivered, and read.

Several Lords—Took the Oath.

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, till To-morrow,

The Lord Chancellor

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 10th December, 1868.

The House met at Two of the clock.

On which day, being the day appointed by the Royal Proclamation for the meeting of the new Parliament, Sir Denis Le Marchant, Baronet, Clerk of the House of Commons, and Sir Thomas Erskine May, and Henry Ley, Esquire, Clerks Assistants, attending in the House, and the other Clerks attending, according to their duty, Charles Romilly, Esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in Great Britain, delivered to the said Sir Denis Le Marchant a Book, containing a List of the Names of the Members returned to serve in this Parliament.

A Message was delivered by Colonel Clifford, Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod:

"Gentlemen,

"The Lords, authorized by virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, desire the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the House of Peers, to hear the Commission read."

Accordingly, the House went up to the House of Peers;—and a Commission having been read for opening and holding the Parliament, The Lords Commissioners directed the House to proceed to the Election of a Speaker, and present him To-morrow at Two of the clock in the House of Peers, for the Royal Approbation.

And the House being returned;

ELECTION OF A SPEAKER.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SIR GEORGE GREY, addressing himself to the Clerk (who, standing up, pointed to him, and then sat down), said:—Sir Denis Le Marchant, in compliance with the communication which has just been addressed to us by the Crown, it is our duty now to proceed without delay to the election of a Speaker, and I have great satisfaction in proposing that my right hon.

Friend the Member for North Nottinghamshire (Mr. John Evelyn Denison) should be chosen to fill that honourable and important office. I have the greater satisfaction in submitting this proposal to the House, because I have every reason to believe that it is one which will meet with its unanimous concurrence. Twelve years, or nearly twelve years, have now passed since, on a vacancy in the office of Speaker, Mr. Denison's long experience as a private Member of this House, his high character, his sedulous attention to the business of the House, especially to that important branch of it which relates to private legislation, and his intimate acquaintance with the Rules and Orders of the House, pointed him out as a fit successor to one who had long filled the Chair of this House with eminent ability, the present Viscount Eversley. In two subsequent Parliaments the House of Commons has ratified the choice first made in 1857, and has thereby shown a gratifying and well-merited proof of its approval of Mr. Denison's conduct in the Chair, and of its confidence in the judgment and impartiality with which he has discharged the duties—duties laborious, and often very difficult—which attach to the office of Speaker. Mr. Denison's Parliamentary life now extends, I believe, over a period of more than forty years, during nearly twelve of which he has occupied the Chair of this House, and we all rejoice to know that he still retains that physical and mental vigour which are required for the efficiency of the office of Speaker. The present House of Commons contains, I believe, an unusually large proportion of new Members, and it is, therefore, the more important that we should choose to preside over our debates a Member of long experience and tried capacity, who will be able by the firm, but, at the same time, moderate and forbearing, exercise of his authority, to enforce, with the general concurrence of the House, those regulations, the due observance of which is essential, not only to the order and dignity, but to the real freedom of our discussions. There are, however, other duties besides those which are performed while sitting in the Chair of this House which devolve upon the Speaker, and in which every Member of this House has a deep interest. To those who have long had seats in this House I need say nothing as to the courteous and admirable manner in which Mr. Denison has discharged those duties; but to those Members who are about for the first time to take their seats, I may state with confidence that on all occasions on which they may have recourse to Mr. Denison, if he should be elected to be our Speaker, on any matter of doubt or difficulty, they will find him ready to give the most patient and careful consideration to every inquiry addressed to him, and to all facts submitted to him, and they will receive from him information on which they may confidently rely, and counsel which they cannot fail in doing well implicitly to follow. The unanimity which I have ventured to anticipate renders it unnecessary that I should trespass at any length upon the House. I will only, therefore, express the gratification I feel, that coming, as so many of those do whom I have the honour to address, fresh from scenes of keen political strife and contest, with cheers and counter-cheers—and perhaps sounds of a less agreeable nature which are heard at the hustings—still ringing in their ears, ominous of future political warfare within these walls, it has been thought right, on this the first meeting of a new Parliament, to lay aside for a moment the weapons of party warfare and to join with one voice—as I hope we are about to do—in placing in the Chair of this House one who will adorn it, one who we know will, if necessary maintain all the privileges of the House, who will fill the Chair with honour to himself, with satisfaction to the House, and with advantage to the public interests. I will only add that this unanimity may, I hope, be taken as the best possible assurance that, from both sides of the House and from all parties within it, the Speaker, in the judicious exercise of his authority, will receive that hearty and willing support which really constitutes the strength of the authority with which he is intrusted. I beg to propose to the House for their Speaker the Right honourable John Evelyn Denison, and move “That the Right honourable John Evelyn Denison do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.”

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SPENCER HORATIO WALPOLE: Sir Denis Le Marchant, at the request of Members on both sides of the House, and of those Gentlemen who naturally and properly have the greatest influence in this House, I rise with great pleasure to second the proposition which my right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) has so judiciously and ably submitted to our consideration. I mention that I do this with the concurrence of those who have, justly and properly, the highest influence in this House, because I hope it will show that my right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth was not mistaken in his anticipations that the proposal he made will be—as I hope and believe—unanimously accepted by every part of the House. My right hon. Friend has enumerated some of the duties which attach to the office of Speaker, and has pointed out how ably those duties, with regard to the private as well as the Public Business of the House have been discharged by the right hon. Member for North Nottinghamshire (Mr. Denison). I might follow him further by drawing a distinction between those who are older Members of this House, and those who have now come for the first time within its walls. With regard to the former I will only say, that their knowledge of the care and attention, of the firmness and fairness, of the honesty and impartiality which Mr. Denison has always shown in that now vacant Chair, fully entitle him, in their opinion, to the honour of being elected there again. With regard to the new Members—those who come for the first time into this House—perhaps I might venture to point out to them some of the qualifications which the Speaker may be expected to have, and which, I believe, they will find that Mr. Denison, when elected, does eminently possess. We require, first of all, a long experience, a practical knowledge of Parliamentary Business, a vigilant jealousy of our rights and liberties, and the highest regard for the honour of this distinguished Assembly; and added to this—what I think is as important as anything else—a steady adherence to the traditions of the past, with a judicious application of those traditions to any new circumstances or emergencies that may happen to arise. Having enumerated these qualifications for the office of Speaker, I believe I may honestly assure the younger Members of the House—an assurance in which the older Members will bear me out—that those qualifications unquestionably belong to my right hon. Friend (Mr. Denison). Even were this an ordinary occasion, there would, therefore, be an obvious propriety in inviting Mr. Denison to take that Chair; but this is not an ordinary occasion, and there are special reasons which make it important that the knowledge and experience which Mr. Denison possesses should now be given for the benefit of this House by his filling the high office of Speaker. I allude, of course, to the great and extensive changes which have been made in the primary elements of the representative system of this country. The proper working of that system can be best secured by having a person sitting in that Chair who can preside over our councils, and, if necessary, guide and direct them, with an authority which belongs only to those who have filled the duties of that Chair so worthily and efficiently as Mr. Denison has done. And if the independence and authority of this House be dear, as I trust is the case, to our hearts, I think I may add that the usages and customs of Parliamentary life will best secure that independence and authority when we have in the Chair a person who hitherto has been able to do as he may still be required to do—to interpret, to preserve, and to enforce those laws and rules on which the very life of our independence and authority depends. With these few remarks I beg to second the proposition which has been made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth, and I trust that the words which he uttered will be found to be true, and that Mr. Denison will now be invited to the Chair, with the spontaneous and unanimous approbation of all the Members of this House.

The House then calling Mr. EVELYN DENISON to the Chair—

MR. EVELYN DENISON stood up in his place and said: I am deeply moved, the House will believe, by the words which have been spoken by my right hon. Friends, and by the manner in which my nomination has been accepted by the House. The House proposes to do me a great honour, and it has largely enhanced the value of that honour by the manner in which it has been conferred. After filling the Chair in three Parliaments, to have a nomination proposed from both sides of the House, and accepted with general concurrence, is an acknowledgment highly prized, and which can never be forgotten by me. It would be unbecoming in me to occupy the time of the House by a single unnecessary word, and I confine myself to the simple expression of my thanks. Whatever of health and strength may be yet granted to me I freely dedicate to the service of the House, and I now submit myself to its pleasure.

The House then again unanimously calling Mr. EVELYN DENISON to the Chair, he was taken out of his place by the said Right honourable Sir George Grey and the Right honourable Spencer Horatio Walpole, and by them conducted to the Chair.

Then MR. SPEAKER ELECT, standing on the upper step, said: I was about to prefer a request to the House; but I feel, by the manner in which the proceedings of to-day have been conducted, that this favour has been already virtually granted, I was about to ask that the full measure of gracious confidence and generous support which has been afforded me on past occasions, and by which alone the duties of my office can be effectually performed, may be still extended to me. My right hon. Friend who seconded the nomination (Mr. Walpole), has observed that this is not an ordinary occasion, and that new responsibilities devolve in some degree upon us all, and perhaps more particularly on the person who is chosen to preside over this House. We are met to-day under a new state of the electoral law. The late House of Commons was considered not adequately to represent the great body of the people—the present House has been elected on the basis of household suffrage. It has thus been endowed with a considerable increase of power. Whatever measures it may, after due deliberation, consider necessary for the public good, it will doubtless deal with boldly and firmly. At the same time, it will not forget that the great grace and ornament of strength is moderation in its exercise—asserting itself, but respecting the rights of others; and this House has always in its own proceedings acted in that spirit. It has afforded protection to minorities, it has permitted freedom of speech and ample latitude of debate, and without doubt it will not depart from that course. I hope and firmly believe, that this House will prove itself worthy of its high destinies, and that it will be found second to none of those which have preceded it in those great qualities which have made the name of the House of Commons famous as the cradle of liberty, and the bulwark of order and of law. I once more make my grateful and respectful acknowledgments for the great honour you have conferred upon me.

Then—

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, the pleasant and honourable, but to me unexpected, task, has—in the absence of those by whom it would have been appropriately discharged—devolved upon me of offering to you, in the name of the House, a few words of congratulation upon the distinction to which the acclamations of its Members have now, for the fourth time, raised you. Mindful, as many of us are, of past Parliaments, in which, during many an eventful day and night spent within these walls, you have maintained the privileges, the order, the dignity and the honour of the House, it is a matter of deep congratulation and gratification to us that, notwithstanding the exactions which its duties have necessarily imposed upon you, you have found yourself prepared once more to undertake its arduous labours and anxieties. I am sure that I only speak the general feeling when I say that, as far as depends on the House over which you have been called upon to preside, the same personal respect and regard—the same loyal and cheerful deference to the authority with which the Constitution and your position invest you—the same ready support to your vindication of the privileges of this House—will be cheerfully accorded in the future as, I believe, they have been experienced by you in the past. In your position—first among the commoners of England, first among the commoners of this nation, and entitled by your office to speak for them in Parliament assembled—I may perhaps express the impression that you may find weight added to your words, as well as lustre to the seat which you occupy, by the fact that in this Parliament you preside over an Assembly which, in a wider sense than ever, is composed of the representatives of the people. Sir, that health and comfort and all prosperity may be around you in the seat which you occupy, lightening the severity of your labours, and inspiring their discharge with vigour, is the fervent and earnest aspiration of us all. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Three o'clock, till To-morrow.

Friday, 11th December, 1868.

The House met; and Five of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS, namely — The LORD CHANCELLOR, The LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl de Grey and Ripon), The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Earl of Kimberley), The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Viscount Sydney), and The DUKE OF ARGYLL (Secretary of State for India), being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, (commanded the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House.")

And the Commons being at the Bar;

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, PRESENTED AND APPROVED.

MR. EVELYN DENISON, Speaker Elect, said—

"MY LORDS,

"I have to acquaint your Lordships that, in obedience to Her Majesty's Commands, Her Majesty's faithful Commons, in the exercise of their undoubted right and privilege, have proceeded to the election of a Speaker, and that their choice has fallen on myself. I now present myself at your Bar, and submit myself, with all humility, to Her Majesty's gracious approbation."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR;

"MR. DENISON,

"We are commanded to assure you that Her Majesty is fully sensible of your zeal for the public service, of your ample sufficiency to perform the important duties which Her faithful Commons have selected you to discharge, and Her Majesty does most readily approve and confirm you as their Speaker."

The Lord Advocate

Then MR. SPEAKER said—

"MY LORDS,

"I submit myself, with all humility and gratitude, to Her Majesty's gracious commands. It is now my duty, in the name and on behalf of the Commons of the United Kingdom, to lay claim to all their ancient and undoubted rights and privileges. I humbly petition Her Majesty for freedom of speech in debate, freedom from arrest for their persons and servants, and above all, for freedom of access to Her Majesty when occasion should require, and that the most favourable construction should be put upon all their proceedings. And with regard to myself, I pray that if any error should be committed, it may be imputed to myself, and not to Her Majesty's faithful Commons."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR;

"MR. SPEAKER,

"We have it in further command to inform you that Her Majesty doth most readily confirm all the rights and privileges which have ever been granted to or conferred upon the Commons by any of Her Royal predecessors. With respect to yourself, Sir, although Her Majesty is sensible that you stand in no need of such an assurance, Her Majesty will ever put the most favourable construction upon your words and actions."

Then the Commons withdrew.

WRITS AND RETURNS electing The Lord Headley a Representative Peer for Ireland in the Room of the late Earl of Bantry, deceased, with the Certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland annexed thereto—Delivered (on Oath), and Certificate read.

Several Lords—Took the Oath.

House adjourned at Four o'clock, to Tuesday next, Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 11th December, 1868.

The House met at Two of the clock.

The House being met, and Mr. SPEAKER ELECT having taken the Chair, a Message was delivered by the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod:

"MR. SPEAKER,

"The Lords authorized by virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, desire the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the House of Peers."

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker Elect, with the House, went up to the House of Peers, where he was presented to the said Lords Commissioners for Her Majesty's approbation.

Then the LORD CHANCELLOR, one of the said Lords Commissioners, signified Her Majesty's approbation of Mr. Speaker Elect.

The House being returned ;—

MR. SPEAKER said : I have to report to the House that this House proceeded to the House of Peers, where Her Majesty was pleased, by Her Royal Commissioners, to approve of the choice they have made of myself as their Speaker. I then, on their behalf, laid claim, by humble petition to Her Majesty, to all their ancient rights and privileges, to freedom of speech and of debate, to freedom from arrests of their persons and servants, and to free access to the presence of Her Majesty whenever occasion might require; and further, that the most favourable constructions might be put upon all our actions: all which Her Majesty by the said Commissioners was pleased to allow and to confirm in as ample and complete a manner as they have ever been confirmed by Herself or by any of Her Royal predecessors. And then Mr. SPEAKER repeated his most respectful acknowledgments to the House for the high honour they had done him.

MR. SPEAKER then put the House in mind, that the first thing to be done was to take and subscribe the Oath required by law.

MR. SPEAKER then took and subscribed the Oath, first alone; and after him several other Members took and subscribed the Oath; and several Members, being of the People called Quakers, made and subscribed the Affirmation required by Law.

House adjourned at a quarter after Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, 12th December, 1868.

The House met at Two of the clock. Several other Members took and subscribed the Oath.

House adjourned at half after Three o'clock.

Monday, 14th December, 1868.

The House met at Two of the clock.

Several other Members took and subscribed the Oath; and a Member, being one of the People called Quakers, made and subscribed the Affirmation required by Law.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 15th December, 1868.

A SPEECH OF THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

The Commons, who were sent for, being at the Bar,

The LORD CHANCELLOR delivered the Speech of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS to both Houses of Parliament, as follows :—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We have it further in command from Her Majesty to acquaint you that, since the time when Her Majesty deemed it right to call you together, for the consideration of many grave and important matters, several vacancies have occurred in the House of Commons owing to the acceptance of Office from the Crown by Members of that House. It is therefore Her Majesty's pleasure that an opportunity may now be given to issue Writs for supplying the vacancies so occasioned, and that, after a suitable Recess, you may proceed to the consideration of such matters as will then be laid before you."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

NEW PEER.

The Earl Granville, One of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, acquainted the House that Her Majesty had been pleased to create the Right Honourable Sir William Page Wood, Knight, Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, a Peer of this Realm by the Title of Baron Hatherley of Down-Hatherley in the County of Gloucester, and his Lordship, having retired to robe, was introduced in the usual Manner.

The Earl of Abergavenny—Sat first in Parliament after the Death of his Father.

The Lord Carysfort—Sat first in Parliament after the Death of his Father.

William Ernest Baron Feversham, having been created Viscount Helmsley of Helmsley and Earl of Feversham of Ryedale in the North Riding of the County of York—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

EARL GRANVILLE: I may state to your Lordships that, the late Government having resigned, Her Majesty commissioned Mr. Gladstone to form a Government, which he has succeeded in doing. Under these circumstances I venture to think that your Lordships will not deem it unreasonable that I should move the Adjournment of the House to Thursday, the 11th of February.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Three o'clock, to Thursday the 11th of February next, Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 15th December, 1868.

The House met at Two of the clock.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;

The House went; and being returned;

MR. SPEAKER reported, That the Lords Commissioners under the Great Seal for opening and holding this Parliament had made a Communication to both Houses, which Mr. Speaker read to the House, as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"We have it further in command from Her Majesty to acquaint you that, since the time when Her Majesty deemed it right to call you together, for the consideration of many grave and important matters, several vacancies have occurred in the House of Commons owing to the acceptance of Office from the Crown by Members of that House. It is therefore Her Majesty's pleasure that an opportunity may now be given to issue Writs for supplying the vacancies so occasioned, and that, after a suitable Recess, you may proceed to the consideration of such matters as will then be laid before you."

Several other Members took and subscribed the Oath.

NEW WRITS.

MR. AYRTON: In asking the House to proceed to order the issue of New Writs, in accordance with the gracious communication which this House has just received from the Crown, it may be convenient for me to state the course proposed to be pursued in consequence of the great change that has taken place through the passing of the law of last year regulating the proceedings at elections. Under the regulations which have now been superseded, petitions against the return of Members were presented to this House within such time as the House prescribed under power conferred upon it by statute, and in the exercise of that power the House used ordinarily to provide by a Sessional Order that all such petitions should be presented within fourteen days after the return of the election. But in consequence of the law which was passed last year election petitions will now be presented to a tribunal independent of this House—namely, to the Court of Common Pleas in England, and to a similar Court in Scotland and Ireland. Such petitions are to be presented within twenty-one days after the returns have been delivered to the officer appointed to receive them, and therefore this House cannot now proceed as it used to do in this matter. We must now consider what will be the most convenient course to pursue in consequence of the change that has taken place. If I were to ask what is the most convenient course, no doubt, if there are differences of opinion among hon. Members, I should give rise to considerable discussion; but I and the House will agree that as we are here only for a particular purpose, and many hon. Members therefore are not in attendance, and as there are necessarily absent all the responsible Ministers of the Crown, and the Law Officers for England and Ireland, nothing would be more inconvenient than for us to enter upon any discussion as to the course which the House might pursue if we were in search of any novel mode of procedure. It is therefore proposed that we shall confine ourselves to-day strictly within the limits of the practice which prevailed up to the close of the last Parliament, and that we shall to-day only move the issue of such Writs as cannot possibly lead to any discussion—namely, the Writs in those cases in which the period of petitioning has expired. I therefore trust that hon. Members will not embark upon any discussion which is not called for by the course which is proposed by the Government. I may, however, mention that there are several cases in which the period for petitioning has not yet expired, and in order to avoid controversy it will, perhaps, be convenient that the House should adjourn until a day when there can be no question upon the point—the 29th of the present month. Those Writs, with regard to which the time for petitioning has not yet expired, will then be moved. I thought it right to make this explanation to the House, in order that hon. Members may know why all the Writs are not moved for to-day, and why an adjournment is necessary. There is only one other question that can arise, and that is with reference to petitions against a sitting Member which do not claim the seat for the petitioner. I may remind the House that, according to the established usage up to the present time, whenever a petition has been presented, not claiming the seat on behalf of the petitioner, but merely asking that the election may be declared void, it has been usual, where the person returned has accepted Office under the Crown, to direct the New Writ to issue. We shall to-day adhere to that course, and in any case where a petition has been presented, but without claiming the seat, we shall move the issue of a New Writ.

For Greenwich, v. Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone, First Commissioner of the Treasury ; for Oxford City, v. Right

Hon. Edward Cardwell, Secretary of State ; for London University, v. Right Hon. Robert Lowe, Chancellor of the Exchequer ; for Pontefract, v. Right Hon. Hugh Culling Eardley Childers, First Commissioner of the Admiralty ; for Birmingham, v. Right Hon. John Bright, President of the Board of Trade.

On Motion, that a New Writ be issued for London City in the room of the Right Honourable George Joachim Goschen, Commissioner of Poor Law,

MR. GOLDNEY said, that under the old system the House had cognizance of the petitions, and the criterion in issuing a Writ, as determined by the Speaker in 1859 in accordance with a precedent of 1852, was whether the seat was claimed by the petitioners or not. If the seat was claimed, the House declined to issue a Writ, while if otherwise the writ was issued. Under the Act of last Session the only knowledge which the House and the public had of a seat being petitioned against was derived from the official list of the petitions, which the Act prescribed to be drawn up. Now upon that list appeared the name of Mr. Goschen as one of the Members whose return was disputed, and the House had no official information as to whether the seat was claimed by the petitioner or not. He believed that, in point of fact, Mr. Goschen's seat was not claimed, though the seats of other Members were claimed. He had intended to move for a Return and copies of all election petitions ; but the Speaker had ruled that he could only give notice of such a Motion, and the House must therefore consider whether, in the absence of any knowledge of the contents of the petition against Mr. Goschen, it would be right to issue the Writ. It was possible that some other person might be returned if the Writ was issued, and, supposing the seat claimed, the petitioner might be returned by order of the Judge, by which the House would be bound to abide, although a third party had since been elected. He did not know whether any evidence would be offered to satisfy the House the seat was not claimed, and he should be glad to hear an expression of opinion from the Chair as to the best course to be pursued under the circumstances.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER agreed with the hon. and learned Member that in a case where the seat was claimed on petition it would now be as improper as it was formerly to issue a Writ, since the House could have no certain knowledge whether a vacancy existed; but he apprehended that the practice of the House had always been, and always would be, to receive information of facts known to its Members, which facts if disputed could, as in this instance, be verified in the most authentic manner. It might as well be said the House did not know Mr. Goschen had accepted Office, because no certificate or return of the fact was before them, as that they did not know there was no petition claiming the seat. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) must, before moving for the Writ, be taken to have satisfied himself that there existed no obstacle of the kind, and to have given an implied assurance of the fact of which the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goldney) was equally cognizant—namely, that Mr. Goschen's seat was not claimed. That fact being admitted and notorious, he thought no further information was necessary.

MR. COLLINS concurred with the hon. and learned member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) in thinking that the House should issue the Writ. Indeed, he thought they should consider whether they ought not to issue a Writ no matter whether the seat was claimed or not, for otherwise it was open to any elector or candidate to petition and claim the seat of a Cabinet Minister, thus delaying his re-election for a considerable period. If they invariably issued a Writ, the person wrongly returned at the second election would be in nearly the same position as the person originally returned—in other words, he would lose his seat. Facilities should not be offered for vexatious petitions, which might run the risk of interfering with the choice of the Crown. He believed the question was first raised in the case of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's election for Southampton, and again in that of Lord Bury's return for Norwich. Lord Bury was re-elected, but no injustice was inflicted on his opponents, for they petitioned against the second return, on the ground that he was incapacitated by reason of bribery committed by his agents at the former election, and he was unseated. No wrong would be sustained by any parties by the issue of the Writ in all cases.

Sir Roundell Palmer

MR. AYRTON would venture to deprecate a continuance of the discussion, since it could not lead to any immediate conclusion on the point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goldney). When the House met for the despatch of business the subject would doubtless engage its attention, and any hon. Member would have an opportunity of expressing his views upon it. As to the petition against Mr. Goschen's return, he need hardly assure the House that he had informed himself properly upon the point. He held in his hand an office copy of that petition, and the petition did not claim the seat. The fact was admitted by his hon. and learned Friend, and, in making the Motion, he had acted under a full sense of responsibility and in accordance with the rule to which he had referred.

Motion agreed to; Writ ordered.

NEW WRITS.

On Motion, that a new Writ be issued for Louth in the room of the Right Hon. Chichester Samuel Parkinson Fortescue, Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

VISCOUNT BURY said, that with regard to the Writ which had just been moved for, he thought it was quite right that some Member of this House should take notice of the rather exceptional circumstances under which the House had assembled. The fact of their having met in the middle of the Christmas holidays sufficiently proved the inconvenience to which he was about to call attention. Indeed, the inconvenience to Members was so great that he believed the Secretary to the Treasury was astonished that the House had been got together at all; and he shuddered to think of the inconvenience which would have arisen if the Government had been unable to make a House, and if they had been obliged to adjourn from time to time until some fortuitous occurrence of events should have brought a sufficient number of Members together. The only reasons which led to the holding of an Autumn Session had disappeared before the assembling of Parliament on the 10th of December. It was necessary, however, that the ceremony should be gone through in order that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) might go to consult his constituents. It was not sufficient that the right hon. Gentleman had, during the previous election, delivered speeches which, in his opinion, would become the Reform book of the future and the Vade Mecum of Irish Church repealers. Nor was it sufficient that the right hon. Gentleman had been designated to his present high Office by the people at large, and that he had been called to it by august decision of his Sovereign, but it was necessary that he should go again to Greenwich, as if the right hon. Gentleman's constituents had not already heard sufficient of his policy and intentions. As long as this custom had any real and useful effect the House looked on with indifference, but when, in order to carry on the provisions of a statute passed in the reign of Queen Anne, the convenience of the House was affected so closely, it was worthy of consideration whether the custom was not unsuited to the requirements, and contrary to the opinions of the present day. The cost of a Session to the nation was very considerable, and in addition to this there was the inconvenience to hon. Members of which he had spoken. Undoubtedly it was right, when the Act of Queen Anne was passed, and when the power of the Crown was on the increase, that every avenue should be jealously guarded, but nobody would venture to say that the power of the Crown was now on the increase and ought to be diminished. On the contrary, some might concur with Hallam, that it was somewhat overshadowed by the growing power of the House of Commons. This being so, it was not unreasonable that the House should in future refrain from acting upon the statute. If some Members of a new Ministry ought to go back to the constituencies, all ought; but only seven out of the fifteen Members of the present Cabinet and eight out of sixteen subordinate Members of the Government were, in the present case, under the necessity of doing so. The noble Lord, having briefly alluded to the circumstances under which the compromise of 1707 was effected, said that with regard to the observations made on a previous day concerning the Writ issued for the City of London, he was of opinion that no Writ ought to issue when there was a petition claiming the seat to which the Writ referred. In conclusion, he thought he should venture to put on the Paper a Notice of his intention to bring forward a Bill to repeal the objectionable section of the Act of Queen Anne.

Motion agreed to; Writ ordered.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 16th February, 1869.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Five of the Lords Commissioners, namely—The LORD CHANCELLOR, The LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl de Grey and Ripon), The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Earl of Kimberley), The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Viscount Sydney), and The MARQUESS OF AILESBUURY (Master of the Horse), being in their Robes, and seated on a Form between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know “The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House.”

Who being come, with their Speaker—

The LORD CHANCELLOR delivered HER MAJESTY'S Speech to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

“My Lords, and Gentlemen,

“I RECUR to your advice at the earliest period permitted by the arrangements consequent upon the retirement of the late Administration.

“And it is with special interest that I commend to you the resumption of your labours at a time when the popular branch of the Legislature has been chosen with the advantage of a greatly enlarged enfranchisement of My faithful and loyal people.

“I am able to inform you that My relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be most friendly; and I have the satisfaction to believe that they cordially share in the desire by which I am animated for the maintenance of peace. I shall at all times be anxious to use My best exertions for the promotion of this most important object.

“In concurrence with My Allies I have endeavoured, by friendly interposition, to effect a settlement of the differences which have arisen between Turkey and Greece; and I rejoice that our joint efforts have aided in preventing any serious interruption of tranquillity in the Levant.

“I have been engaged in negotiations with the United States of North America for the settlement of questions which affect the interests and the international relations of the two countries; and it is My earnest hope that the result of these negotiations may be to place on a firm and durable basis the friendship which should ever exist between England and America.

“I have learnt with grief that disturbances have occurred in New Zealand, and that at one spot they have been attended with circumstances of atrocity. I am confident that the Colonial Government and people will not be wanting either in energy to repress the outbreaks, or in the prudence and moderation which I trust may prevent their recurrence.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The Estimates for the expenditure of the coming financial year will be submitted to you. They have been framed with a careful regard to the efficiency of the Services, and they will exhibit a diminished charge upon the country.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The ever-growing wants and diversified interests of the Empire will necessarily bring many questions of public policy under your review.

"The condition of Ireland permits Me to believe that you will be spared the painful necessity which was felt by the late Parliament for narrowing the securities of personal liberty in that country by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

"I recommend that you should inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and should consider whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom.

"A measure will be brought under your notice for the relief of some classes of occupiers from hardships in respect of Rating, which appear to be capable of remedy.

"You will also be invited to direct your attention to Bills for the extension and improvement of Education in Scotland; and for rendering the considerable revenues of the Endowed Schools of England more widely effectual for the purposes of instruction.

"A measure will be introduced for applying the principle of representation to the control of the County Rate, by the establishment of Financial Boards for Counties.

"It will be proposed to you to recur to the subject of Bankruptcy, with a view to the more effective distribution of Assets and to the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt.

"The Ecclesiastical arrangements of Ireland will be brought under your consideration at a very early date, and the legislation which will be necessary in order to their final adjustment will make the largest demands upon the wisdom of Parliament.

"I am persuaded that, in the prosecution of the work, you will bear a careful regard to every legitimate interest which it may involve, and that you will be governed by the constant aim to promote the welfare of religion through the principles of equal justice, to secure the action of the undivided feeling and opinion of Ireland on the side of loyalty and law, to efface the memory of former contentions, and to cherish the sympathies of an affectionate people.

"In every matter of public interest, and especially in one so weighty, I pray that the Almighty may never cease to guide your deliberations, and may bring them to a happy issue."

Then the Commons withdrew.

Bill, pro forma, read 1^a.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON HER
MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

THE EARL OF CARYSFORT, rising to move an humble Address to Her Majesty in answer to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, said: My Lords, it is with great diffidence that I rise to address your Lordships for the first time, knowing, as I do, that there are many other Members of your Lordships' House who would perform the task that I am about to attempt with far more ability. I have not even that plea of youth and inexperience for your Lordships' indulgence which has been often put forward by many who have been placed in a similar position, for though I have never felt myself called upon to take an active part in the debates of the other House, I have, nevertheless, for ten years had the privilege of listening to and profiting by them. I can only, therefore, say I am

I have neither wit, nor words, nor worth,
Action, nor utterance, nor the power of speech
To stir men's blood ;"

and, as such, I throw myself upon your Lordships' indulgence. I will only solicit your attention while I briefly touch upon the different matters brought before your notice in the order in which they stand in Her Majesty's gracious Speech.

My Lords, in reviewing the topics recommended to the consideration of Parliament, I cannot help saying that I see rocks looming in the distance around which the breakers are foaming ; but at the same time I believe that the vessel of the State is well manned, that its rigging is strong and new, and that its pilots are good pilots, whose well-tryed zeal and ability peculiarly fit them to steer her through all her difficulties into quiet waters. It is satisfactory to reflect, moreover, that they are supported by a new Parliament representing a new constituency, which has been rendered, by the co-operation of all parties, more extensive and more popular than has ever hitherto been the case.

I am sure that it will be a matter of congratulation to your Lordships that Her Majesty, in the opening paragraphs of her Speech is able to inform you that her present relations with Foreign Powers are of a most peaceful and friendly character, and that through the mediation of the Powers assembled in the Conference at Paris, the difficulties which have arisen between Greece and Turkey are likely to be peacefully settled. I cannot avoid expressing my admiration at the moderation and forbearance which have been displayed by the Turkish Government throughout the whole crisis, which we hope has now been surmounted. At the same time I am sure that in yielding to the friendly representations of the great Powers, Greece will not only be doing that which is most consistent with her own dignity, but she will be showing a laudable disposition to contribute to the maintenance of the general peace.

But, my Lords, great as must be our satisfaction at learning that the ominous cloud that has darkened the Eastern horizon is about to be dispelled, still greater must be our satisfaction at the announcement that the disputes with America which have arisen from claims and counter-claims are likely to be firmly and durably settled by means of a Convention entered into by the predecessors of the present Government, and which, I trust, will be the means of averting a suicidal war, and placing these two nations upon that friendly footing which is so desirable. Whether the result of that Convention be successful or not depends upon the action of the American Senate ; but as we have obtained the approval of the United States Government we are relieved from all imputation of delaying the equitable settlement of the existing difficulties. And I must in justice say, that should this Convention meet with a favourable issue, much of its success will be attributable to the frank and loyal endeavours of the honoured Minister of the United States, who, since he has been amongst us, has been most untiring in his zeal to bring about friendly relations between our country and his.

My Lords, the state of New Zealand calls for serious attention. I do not intend to dwell upon this subject, however, as my noble Friend who seconds the Address is so much better acquainted with all colonial matters than I am.

There are other matters of importance which are brought before your notice in the Royal Speech. They will require your serious attention, but they are chiefly of such a character as not to call forth any party opposition, and I will not, therefore, take up your Lordships' time in referring to them. I will only mention that your attention is particularly directed to the growing importance of local taxation, and to a good measure for improving middle-class education, and for employing more efficiently the considerable revenues of our endowed schools.

My Lords, I will now come to what I may call the chief paragraphs of Her Majesty's Speech—those which refer to the vital question of Ireland. My Lords, the bitter feelings engendered by centuries of misrule are not to be eradicated in a single day, nor are the unhappy memories associated with the past, darkened as they are by penal laws and the injustice arising from religious ascendancy sanctioned by the State, to be obliterated suddenly from the minds of a people sensitive and high-spirited like the Irish. I am happy to think that a brighter day is dawning for Ireland; that "justice to Ireland," is no longer the mere expression of a Minister or the watchword of a party; it has become the fixed and firm resolve of the national will. The national conscience is at length awakened to the conviction that Ireland can no longer be governed upon exceptional principles, and the national voice, responding to its conscience, has pronounced, with an emphasis not to be mistaken, that our future policy towards Ireland must be a policy of right and justice, and must have for its object the conciliation of her people. I know well enough that during the last forty years much has been done to ameliorate the condition of Ireland; but much yet remains to be accomplished; and I cannot help thinking that, now that the mischievous agitation caused by the Penian movement has in a great measure subsided, the moment is peculiarly propitious for the introduction of measures such as are likely to satisfy the Irish people. My Lords, I learn with great pleasure that the first step which the Government propose to take in this direction is the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. No doubt the attention of Parliament will be invited in a short time, to the consideration of this important question; and I am confident that when the policy of the Government is propounded in detail it will be found that due regard has been paid to vested interests. It is impossible to conceal from ourselves that the Irish Protestant Church has never taken a firm hold on the affections of the great mass of the people; that at this moment the Protestants are but 700,000 to nearly 5,000,000 of Roman Catholics; and that on the whole the Church of the minority has been a signal failure. Long ago, Pitt, in one of his speeches, pointed out that the Irish Parliament felt that the claims of the Roman Catholics threatened the existence of Protestant ascendancy; while, on the other hand, the great body of the Catholics felt the establishment of the Protestant national Church, and their exclusion from the exercise of certain rights and privileges, to be a grievance. I am myself a staunch member of the Protestant Church, and I as staunchly believe that the disestablishment of the Irish Church will not weaken it in any degree. On the contrary, I agree with the opinion of the noble Earl (Earl Russell), who, in one of his Letters on the State of Ireland, declares his belief that like the sapling which, when removed from the green-house a tender and fragile plant into the open air, grew from a little feathery bush into a magnificent tree, so the Irish Protestant Church, when no longer dandled and nurtured by the State, will be stronger from the encounter with the fresh and vigorous breezes of heaven, and the light poured down upon it. And to put it on the grounds of common fairness, I will ask if the reasonable demands of millions of Her Majesty's subjects call for the adoption of this measure, are they to be rashly rejected because, in the opinion of some persons, certain contingent evils may possibly arise from it? Let Ireland no longer be ruled by a rod of iron—let the loyalty and love of her children be appealed to. For 300 years that religion, which to them—whatever its errors to us—has been a cherished faith, has been exposed to opprobrium and scorn, and even to cruel oppression—but it has maintained its hold on their hearts and affections—it has been strengthened by every insult, it has been purified by every struggle, and were you to take from it its sacraments, they would say, as Shylock said in a less noble cause—

When you do take the prop that doth sustain my house."

If you steel their hearts by unjust legislation, you render them insensible to the claims of duty and justice; and what wonder if the devil of discontent is let loose, and that they break out from time to time in those wild shrieks of vengeance which are a slur and blot upon the national character? Let it be the business of Parliament to apply its wisdom to the consideration of this great subject. Begin by giving them an unfettered Church; and by thus showing justice you will teach them, in their turn, to act justly. Your recompense may not be immediate; it may not be rendered to you by human hands; but, in acting thus, you will not only be making Ireland a bond of union and strength to the Empire, instead of a source of weakness, but you will be doing that which is due to your own conscience, and to the better service of Him to whom all worship is due. The noble Earl concluded by moving an humble Address to Her Majesty in Answer to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, as follows:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious Speech which Your Majesty has commanded to be made to both Houses of Parliament.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty's relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be most friendly; and we humbly express our satisfaction that those Powers cordially share Your Majesty's desire for the maintenance of peace. We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us of Your Majesty's endeavours, in concurrence with Your Majesty's Allies, to effect a settlement of the differences which have arisen between Turkey and Greece; and we humbly express the gratification with which we learn that these joint efforts have aided in preventing any serious interruption of tranquillity in the Levant.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has entered into negotiations with the United States of North America for the settlement of questions which affect the interests and international relations of the two countries; and we humbly assure Your Majesty that we share in Your Majesty's earnest hope that the result of these negotiations may be to place on a firm and durable basis the friendship which should ever exist between England and America.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we have learnt with grief that disturbances have occurred in New Zealand, and that at one spot they have been attended with circumstances of atrocity; and also that we participate in Your Majesty's confidence that the Colonial Government and people will not be wanting either in energy to repress the outbreaks, or in the prudence and moderation which we trust will prevent their recurrence.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that the condition of Ireland leads Your Majesty to believe that we may be spared the painful necessity which was felt by the late Parliament for narrowing the securities of personal liberty in that country by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

"We humbly express to Your Majesty the readiness with which we shall inquire into the present mode of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and consider whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that measures will be laid before us for the relief of some classes of occupiers from hardships in respect of Rating, which seem capable of remedy; for the extension and improvement of Education in Scotland; and for rendering the considerable revenues of the Endowed Schools of England more widely effectual for the purposes of instruction; and also for introducing the principle of representation to the control of the County Rate, by the establishment of Financial Boards for Counties.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that we shall be invited to recur to the subject of Bankruptcy, with a view to the more effective distribution of Assets and to the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that our serious attention shall be given to the Ecclesiastical arrangements of Ireland, and to the legislation which will be necessary in order to their final adjustment; and further that in the prosecution of this work we shall bear a careful regard to every legitimate interest which it may involve, and that we shall be governed by the constant aim to promote the welfare of religion through the principles of equal justice, to secure the action of the undivided feeling and opinion of Ireland on the side of loyalty and law, to efface the memory of former contentions, and to cherish the sympathies of an affectionate people.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that with Your Majesty we fervently pray that the Almighty may in this, as in every matter of public interest, never cease to guide our deliberations, and bring them to a happy issue."

LORD MONCK, in seconding the Address, said :—My Lords, no word I hope will fall from me which will interfere in any way with that unanimity with which it is desirable that we should approach the Throne on the first night of the Session. We have, I think, arrived at a point in our national progress at which, like the traveller who has climbed some lofty eminence, we may pause and take a retrospect of the course over which we have journeyed. We have just passed through a great crisis. We have admitted to the exercise of the electoral franchise large bodies of our fellow-countrymen who have hitherto been debarred from all direct influence over the Government of the country; and I think I do not exaggerate in saying that by a simple act of our ordinary legislation we have effected as great a transfer of political power as in other countries has been brought about by the fall of dynasties, the overthrow of institutions, and the effusion of blood. Nor have we only admitted these new elements into our Constitution. The late General Election has enabled us to form a very fair estimate of the effect which their introduction may be expected to have on our institutions. Now, remembering the gloomy prophecies indulged in by those who opposed the Reform Act of 1867, and the not very cheerful anticipations of those who promoted it, I regard the present aspect of affairs as by no means unsatisfactory; for the perfect calm which pervades the public mind, and the entire absence of popular demands for revolutionary or organic changes, ought to be reassuring to all, and convince us that if—to borrow the metaphor of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby)—we have taken “a leap in the dark,” we have been fortunate enough, at all events, to alight on our feet. Nor need this result have been unexpected. It is impossible to review the political action of the last thirty years without being struck by the large share taken by those not then admitted to the electoral franchise in bringing about many legislative measures which are now generally admitted to have been wise and beneficial; and I think the discussion and agitation in which that portion of the community took part during that period not merely educated them in political knowledge, but prepared them for the exercise of political rights when they came to be conferred upon them.

My Lords, the first paragraph of the Speech from the Throne congratulates Parliament on the state of things I have endeavoured to describe, and the first paragraph in the Address—to which I think there will be no difficulty in agreeing—thanks Her Majesty for those congratulations.

But before touching on the positive announcements contained in other paragraphs respecting those principal topics on which the Government propose legislation during the ensuing Session, I will first refer to our foreign relations; and your Lordships must be glad to learn that Her Majesty continues to receive friendly assurances from foreign Powers; and that information has a peculiar significance at the present moment, because the representatives of all the great European Powers have lately met in Conference at Paris, and it may be presumed that confidential communications were then interchanged which enable Her Majesty to speak with greater assurance respecting the intentions of foreign States than if she were dependent only on the ordinary sources of diplomatic intelligence. I cannot refrain from adding that I regard this Conference as a new and satisfactory feature in diplomacy. It is the fashion, I know to sneer at arbitration as a mode of settling international disputes, and it has been urged that if one of the parties to such an arbitration should refuse to be bound by the award there were no means of compelling him, except by a resort to war, to avoid which was the very object of the arbitration. But those who so reason, and who would on this ground discard arbitration, show, I think, a forgetfulness of the great and increasing influence exercised by public opinion as distinguished from positive law on the ordinary concerns of life. How easy it is for a reckless or unprincipled man, if he can discard all sense of shame, to outrage society without bringing himself within the reach of any positive enactment, and yet how seldom such cases occur! Now the facilities which now exist for the collection and dissemination of intelligence throughout the Continent tend to build up an international European public opinion, the full force and influence of which can hardly be conceived, while the territorial changes in central Europe, all leading to the equalization of the forces of the great military monarchies, make it every day of greater consequence for any Power which would seek to break the peace to obtain the support of that public opinion. I cannot believe that a power so influential over each individual in private society may not to some extent influence the intercourse of nations, and I trust that the precedent set on this occasion may be improved and enlarged; so that, if it be impossible to realize the poet's dream of some mode may at least be devised of settling international misunderstandings more in consonance with the spirit of the age than the vulgar and clumsy method of an appeal to brute force.

Your Lordships, I am sure, heartily join in the hope expressed by the Address, that the negotiations for the settlement of the questions pending between England and the great American Republic may be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, and that every obstacle which may prevent the two nations from being one in sentiment and affection, as they are already one in origin and interest, may be removed.

My Lords, turning to New Zealand, I have always observed that when our colonial possessions obtain the compliment of mention in the Royal Speech it is on account of their being in some trouble; their relations with the mother country make it natural that this should be the case. We have conceded to them—most wisely, as I believe—the right of self-government; and as long as the political machine works smoothly we hear, of course, little or nothing about them; but as soon as trouble supervenes it immediately reaches our ears. I regret that the allusion to New Zealand on this occasion is no exception to the rule, for a serious encounter has, as is well known, taken place between the European and Native populations. I sincerely join in the hope expressed in the Royal Speech that the colonists will exhibit both energy and firmness in the suppression of these risings, and forbearance and moderation in their future dealings with the Natives. I am glad to observe that no intention is announced of sending British troops to assist in the suppression of the risings, for in a colony where, as in New Zealand, the European outnumbers the Native population, I believe in the proportion of about five to one, it would appear to me to be nothing short of a slander on British manhood to suppose that they are not able unassisted to defend themselves against outbreaks of this kind. There is another and a stronger reason why we should not despatch British troops to their assistance. We are counselling the colonists to exhibit energy in preparation for attack, and forbearance in their dealings with the Natives; but as long as we leave British troops in such a colony, precisely to the extent that we leave them shall we diminish, in the minds of the colonists, the inducement to accept both branches of our advice. On the one hand, the sense of security afforded by the presence of a military force deprives the colonists of the motive for taxing themselves for the purpose of preparation; while, on the other hand, the sense of strength which the presence of the troops gives, takes from them a strong motive for the exercise of moderation and forbearance in their dealings with the Natives. I trust, therefore, that my noble Friend (Earl Granville) and his Colleagues will not allow themselves to be persuaded by any argument drawn from this outbreak, either to send out troops or to suspend the arrangements which I believe have been made for the entire withdrawal of the Imperial troops from New Zealand.

My Lords, before noticing the subjects on which the Government propose legislation this Session, I wish to refer to a negative announcement which all must have heard with gratification—the announcement that Her Majesty's Government do not anticipate the necessity of renewing the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. I am not one of those who would refuse to any Government any extraordinary powers for which they might ask for the purpose of enabling them to perform that which is the first duty of all Governments—the maintenance of law and order; nor, considering the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, would I press on any Government the premature abandonment of such powers. Upon the Members of the Administration must rest the responsibility of retaining or abandoning them, for they alone possess the information which can guide them to a right conclusion ; but if, on full consideration, they are of opinion that those powers may now be relinquished, it will certainly give your Lordships sincere pleasure to see Ireland restored to her normal constitutional position.

Passing to another topic, I will remind your Lordships that, notwithstanding the generally satisfactory nature of the recent elections, it is notorious, both from personal observation and from the revelations before the tribunals newly instituted for the trial of Election Petitions, that in certain localities a considerable amount of undue influence, both personal and pecuniary, has been exercised, and it being important, if a legislative remedy is to be applied to the evil, that the facts should be accurately ascertained, no time, I conceive, can be more suitable for conducting such an inquiry than the assembling of a new Parliament, when all the circumstances of the late election are fresh in the recollection of the public.

I now come, my Lords, to the last two paragraphs of the Address, those relating to the Irish Church. I think that, considering what took place during the last Session of the last Parliament ; considering the verdict returned by the constituencies to whom the question was directly put ; the course taken by the late Government in consequence of that verdict ; and, looking to the circumstances under which the present Administration acceded to Office, your Lordships would have been greatly surprised if this important subject had not occupied a prominent place in the Royal Speech. Assuming, then, that an allusion to the subject should have been made, it has been conceived, as it appears to me, in a spirit of moderation and forbearance, and is so framed that any noble Lord may concur in the Address without in any way compromising himself with regard to the principles of the question. What will be the nature or details of the measure which will be proposed by the Government I need hardly say I have no authority to state ; but as an Irishman and a Churchman, interested on the one hand in the effect which the measure will produce on the minds of my fellow-countrymen — deeply interested on the other hand in its bearing on my Church—I deem it my duty to lay down three principles which I conceive to be indispensable if the measure is to be a final and effectual one. The first is that the disconnection of the Church from the State should be complete and immediate ; the second is that the scheme of disendowment must be so framed as to leave no ground of distinction between persons professing different religious creeds ; and the third is that the Anglican Church, disconnected from the State, must be left entirely free to adopt her own organization and form of government. My chief fear, I confess, is that the opponents of the measure, though unable to defeat it in its main objects, may be sufficiently powerful to retain some paltry shred or shadow of establishment or endowment which will be of no substantial advantage to the Church, will diminish the beneficial effect of the measure on the minds of the population, and will perpetuate that spirit of hostility towards the Church which, I am sorry to say, now animates a large portion of the Irish people. I have for many years been of opinion that the change now proposed is demanded by justice and dictated by sound policy. Even if it were otherwise—even if it should seem injurious to the Church—it would make no alteration in my views—I would wish justice to be done, at whatever cost ; but I am firmly convinced that the true interests of the Irish Church concur with the demands of justice and policy. Nothing, I believe, has had so potent an effect in preventing the extension of the Anglican Church in Ireland as its connection with the State. By the position of ascendancy in which we have placed her, we have enlisted against her every generous impulse which animates the human breast, and have rendered it difficult, if not impossible, for a man of such impulses to leave the communion of the Church of Rome for that of the Church of England. To take such a step we require him to leave the side of the weak and range himself on the side of the strong—to leave what appears to the Irish people the side of the oppressed, and to take the side of the oppressor. I do not, however, desire to fight under false colours, and I admit that, independently of the special circumstances of the Irish Church, I am on principle and as a Churchman opposed to all connection between Church and State. I believe that wherever that connection exists the same blighting and benumbing influence will be found to affect the Church, like — to draw an illustration from commerce—the effect exercised by Protection upon those branches of trade to which it was applied. Holding these views, I need not tell your Lordships that I do not share in the gloomy forebodings of those who think that the measure will be a death-blow to the Irish Church—that she cannot survive her severance from the secular power—the experience I have had in Canada of the beneficial effect on the Church of throwing her upon her own resources precludes me from entertaining such apprehensions. I cannot bring myself to think so meanly of my fellow-religionists as to suppose they will not be prepared to make the sacrifices necessary for the maintenance of their Church; and, I say it with all reverence, I have too firm a faith in the vitality of my own religion, and in the source whence its vitality is derived, to doubt for a moment that the necessary funds will be forthcoming. I may be mistaken, but I look forward to a noble future for the Irish Church when, invigorated by the sense of self-reliance and the consciousness of self-sustenance, released from the unhappy and false position with regard to the great mass of the population in which establishment has placed her, and relieved from the opprobrium of injustice, she shall be enabled to lay her pure doctrine, her pious practice, and her noble ritual before the dispassionate observation of an unprejudiced people. My Lords, I beg to second the Address which has been just moved by the noble Earl.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR having read the Address, [See Page 32.]

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, it is satisfactory that, while dealing with subjects upon many of which considerable difference of opinion must be entertained, the language in which your Lordships are asked to address the Crown is framed in a manner which is unlikely to provoke dissent, much less division. My Lords, some of the communications in the most gracious Speech of the Sovereign your Lordships cannot fail to receive with feelings of pleasure. My Lords, it is a matter of congratulation that the outbreak between Turkey and Greece, which a short time ago appeared to be so imminent, is now unlikely to occur. It is a matter for congratulation that the firmness and the moderation displayed by Turkey have been rewarded by the acceptance on the part of Greece of the main points of the ultimatum originally proposed by Turkey, when its conditions were offered to Greece through the Conference which has lately sat at Paris. Notwithstanding, however, what has fallen from the noble Lord who seconded the Address, I venture to say that it may perhaps be doubted what was the specific object which was proposed by that Conference, and I think it may also be doubted whether, if Her Majesty's Government and the other great Powers felt themselves prepared to recommend to Greece the acceptance of those propositions, that end might not have been obtained with equal effect without the somewhat hazardous expedient of calling a Conference together. However this may be, it would be premature at the present moment to express any definite opinion upon the subject, because, although we do not find that there is any promise in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech that the Papers relating to this subject will be laid before us, I have no doubt that Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to lay upon the table as soon as possible the Papers relating to the proceedings of the Conference. Your Lordships, I have no doubt, have also heard with satisfaction that there is a prospect that the negotiations entered into for the purpose of terminating the matters which have been in difference between this country and the United States are likely to be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. We are not informed what is the precise state at this moment of those negotiations, or of the form which the settlement is likely to assume; and therefore I can only express a hope—in which I am sure your Lordships will heartily join—that when that settlement is completed—if it be completed—and when it is laid before Parliament, we shall find in it materials which may lead us to entertain a sanguine hope that the good feeling and friendship between this country and the United States will in future be increased and perpetuated. My Lords, I gather from the most gracious Speech of Her Majesty that it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose to your Lordships any measure for the continuance of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. My Lords, I agree with what

as said just now by the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Carysfort), that Parliament must always feel pain when asked to suspend in any part of the kingdom the Habeas Corpus Act, and so take away one of the great safeguards of the liberties of the subject. At the same time, it appears to me that the course which has always been taken by Parliament upon this subject is a wise one—namely, to trust very much in a matter of this kind to the responsibility of the Executive Government of the country. It is to the Executive Government of the country that we must trust in a great measure for advice when we are asked to suspend, when we are asked to continue, or when we are asked to take off the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. I have no doubt that if Her Majesty's Government have come to the determination that it is no longer necessary to ask Parliament to renew the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, we shall be informed at the proper time by Her Majesty's Government of the improved state of the country which has led them to adopt that resolution. My Lords, there is still another subject in the most gracious Speech upon which no difference of opinion can be entertained. We are told—or rather the House of Commons is told—that the Estimates for the coming year have been framed with a careful regard to the efficiency of the services. Now, if the Estimates have been framed, as has been intimated, with a careful regard to the efficiency of the services, I venture to say there is no person in either House of Parliament who will not concur in expressing satisfaction at any diminution in the charges upon the country which may be effected. The only question which it appears to me can arise at the proper time will be, not whether the true criterion has been adopted—because upon that point there can be no doubt that the true criterion is a proper regard to the efficiency of the services—but whether that criterion has been properly applied in any reductions that have been proposed. I come now to a passage in the Speech which I own has occasioned me some doubt with regard to its meaning. We are told that Her Majesty has been advised to address Parliament by recommending Parliament to consider whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom."

I do not understand this paragraph as intimating—nor do I think that any such interpretation has been put upon it by either of the noble Lords the Mover and Seconder of the Address—that any measure is about to be proposed on this subject on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Upon the idea intended to be conveyed by this paragraph I apprehend there can be no dispute. Every person must wish that the elections of this country, whether Parliamentary or municipal, should be provided with every guarantee for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom. What I understand this passage to point to is not legislation to be proposed by the Government, but inquiry. We are quite accustomed to being informed in the Speech from the Throne that the Sovereign has been advised to issue a Royal Commission on any subject requiring investigation; but I do not understand this passage as pointing to a Royal Commission; because I apprehend that if that had been the case we should have been informed that such a Commission had been issued, and should not have been told that Parliament should institute an inquiry into the subject. I therefore regard the passage as pointing to a Committee of Parliament—that is to say, a Committee of one or both Houses of Parliament. I only venture to observe upon this in passing for the purpose of expressing some doubt as to—I will not say the analogy, but the precedent upon which the Speech has been in this respect founded. As far as I am aware, there has been no instance in which the Crown has been made to suggest to Parliament the appointment of a Committee of one or the other of the Houses of Parliament for the purpose of making any inquiry. The course is for the Government to advise the Crown. It is armed with power to institute any inquiry which it thinks desirable; the Government is also in the habit of proposing to Parliament any legislation it may think desirable. But I am not aware of any precedent for the Government advising the Crown to recommend Parliament to institute an inquiry through the instrumentality of a Parliamentary Committee. My Lords, in the contents of the most gracious Speech, with regard to domestic legislation, with one very important exception to which I shall in a moment refer, there is not much that calls for remark from me. We are informed, in the first place, that

* To inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and

“A measure will be brought forward for the relief of some classes of occupiers from hardships in respect of Rating, which appear to be capable of remedy.”

We shall hear, no doubt, in due time, what these hardships are supposed to be, and what is the remedy which it is intended to apply to them. We are then informed that there is to be

“A measure for applying the principle of representation to the control of the County Rate;” and “A measure for the extension and improvement of Education in Scotland, and for rendering the considerable revenues of the Endowed Schools of England more widely effectual for the purposes of instruction.”

But I see no intimation in the Speech—and I own the omission has occasioned me some surprise—that any measure is to be introduced with regard to primary education in England. We are told, finally, that we are to have again an old familiar friend—a measure with regard to Bankruptcy, which has become an annual acquaintance of your Lordships during many Sessions of Parliament. Passing from these measures, I come now to what has been reserved in the Speech till the last, and which no doubt is the most important part of the gracious Speech. It is called by the very sonorous and I think novel term of a “final adjustment of the ecclesiastical arrangements” of Ireland. I do not dwell on that descriptive term, neither do I dwell—although it is somewhat tempting—on the strange accumulation of phrases, and what appears to be the almost fortuitous collocation of adjectives and substantives which is to be found in the penultimate sentence of the most gracious Speech. I quite agree with the noble Lord who seconded the Address, that, having regard to the circumstances under which the present Administration accepted Office, which are fresh in your Lordships’ recollection, there was not any course open to them but that which they have taken—namely, to introduce into the most gracious Speech a mention of legislation with regard to the Church in Ireland, and a statement that they were prepared to lay before Parliament their policy with regard to that question.

Lord Cairns

I think we need not be surprised that that which was the natural course has been adopted by Her Majesty’s Government, and I think your Lordships will agree with me that nothing could be more inconvenient than that, before we have the measure laid on the table of the House, before we have any intimation from the Government itself as to what the character of the measure will be, I should be tempted to follow the noble Lord who seconded the Address, and enter upon a discussion of what the measure may turn out to be which Her Majesty’s Government will ultimately propose to Parliament. I should be still further unwilling to attribute to Her Majesty’s Government some, at least, of the views of the noble Lord who proposed and of the noble Lord who seconded the Address, until we have reason to know that these are the views which they actually entertain. Indeed, if I am not mistaken, the noble Lord who seconded the Address went so far as to say—whether speaking from inspiration by the Government or not, of course, I cannot tell—that in his opinion the connection in any phase and in any country of Church and State was an undesirable thing for the Church, that it had a benumbing effect, and that the question was not in any way an Irish question, but one applicable to all places. [Viscount Monck intimated assent.] I thought I understood what was said by the noble Lord, and I am glad to find that I have rightly represented him. I may express my great satisfaction at some things which are contained in the Speech, and I am glad to concur with the noble Lord who seconded the Motion, that the language in which the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne is framed is such that it cannot be taken as an expression of opinion at either side of the House as to what the measure on the subject of the ecclesiastical settlement in Ireland ought to be. I am also glad to find that the measure which the Government are prepared to propose is to be submitted to Parliament at a very early period; for I can conceive nothing more desirable than that upon a subject of this transcendental importance the most ample time should be given to both Houses of Parliament for careful, dispassionate, and close examination of any course of policy which may be proposed, and of the reasons on which that course of policy may be founded. I am also glad to find, if I read the Speech correctly, that the policy of the Government is to be submitted to your Lordships' consideration in a complete and final form, and is not to be submitted, as I have seen some suggestions that it might be, by instalments, or in a fragmentary manner. We shall hear, no doubt, from the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Earl Granville), at a convenient time, what will be the business to which the Government will ask your Lordships to address your attention in the first instance. And I will venture, if the noble Earl will allow me, to suggest to him the great importance both to your Lordships' convenience, and to the efficient discharge of your Lordships' business, that this House should not be, if possible, reduced to a state of compulsory inactivity up to the month of July or August, and afterwards have thrown upon it in the short remainder of the Session such an amount of business as it is utterly impossible to transact. The noble Earl cannot suppose I am making any complaint of a Government which has not yet had an opportunity of deciding what course they will take on any subject. I am only taking the liberty of offering the suggestion to him for what he may think it worth, that although there are some measures which can only be fitly proposed in the other House, there are measures which can be dealt with quite as fitly in this House as in the House of Commons. I would remind your Lordships what happened with regard to what I have called an old familiar friend—the Bankruptcy Bill. A Bill of great magnitude was proposed last year which, after all, was only the fruit and consequence of former Bills on the same subject, with the improvements which time had shown to be required. That Bill, after being fully considered by the public in all its main provisions, and being approved of by the whole mercantile community, received the approbation of your Lordships' House; but we were obliged to abandon its prosecution owing to the pressure of business before Parliament. A very small fragment of that Bill was brought forward as a separate measure in "another place," and ultimately became law; and I am glad to find from statements which have been made that even that fragment of a larger measure has already been productive of most beneficial effects. If it should be the determination of Her Majesty's Government to introduce into this House either their measure of bankruptcy reform, or any other of the measures which they have to offer to Parliament, on behalf of those who sit upon this side of the House I think I may venture to offer to the noble Earl—while reserving to ourselves the right of most candid criticism with regard to those measures—a frank and willing co-operation in promoting and expediting the public business.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am sure your Lordships cannot fail to be aware that the position of a Member of the Government who rises to speak on this occasion is one of difficulty. The remarkable speeches which were made by the two noble Lords, the Mover and Second of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, exhausted the most important topics of that Speech, and I am bound to say that the speech which has just been made by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) leaves hardly any subject on which it is necessary for me to touch. But before making the very few observations which I shall feel called upon to offer in answer to what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, your Lordships will excuse me for saying that which may appear somewhat egotistical. After having been for some years in this House in a certain degree the organ of the Government, I find myself again in the same position. I felt during the former time that the only means by which I was able to discharge the functions of that office were by the cordial and consistent support of my Friends, and, I must also add, by the forbearance of some of those who sit on the opposite side of this House. With regard to my Friends, I feel that their support is more necessary to me than ever. I succeed a man who has created for himself a great name in history, and I also feel the disadvantage of having exactly opposite to me one known for the highest possible skill derivable from professional training. I have no right to claim for the future any forbearance from those who are opposed to me; but I have derived some hope from the speech just delivered that the daily judicial habit enables the noble and learned Lord opposite to do—what he has certainly done this evening — to temper the keenness of the political party advocate of the evening. With regard to the observations of the noble and learned Lord, the greater part of them, both in substance and in tone, was in approval of Her Majesty's Speech. The noble and learned Lord expressed the satisfaction which I am sure is felt by all at the friendly relations which Her Majesty's Government entertains with all the foreign Powers. I could not express in more fitting terms the wish that is felt in this country that the negotiations with the United States may tend to strengthen those relations of friendship and amity which ought to exist between the two nations. The noble and learned Lord, alluding to the controversy which has happily terminated in settling the disputes between Turkey and Greece, paid just compliments to the conduct of Turkey in this matter. He also expressed a wish and a just expectation that Papers on this subject would be laid before your Lordships as early as possible. I think I am not wrong in stating that up to this date the Papers are prepared for presentation; but there are reasons which your Lordships will easily understand why, during the last week which is to terminate this affair, it is better not to do anything calculated to re-open discussion. I believe that when these Papers are produced, your Lordships will see that Her Majesty's Government partook of the impression to which the noble and learned Lord gave utterance, and were of opinion that the three Powers might have settled the matter without difficulty, and that when yielding to the wishes of their allies to refer the matter to a general Conference, it was owing to the exertions of my noble Friend in settling with the other Powers of Europe to the precise bases upon which the Conference should meet that the happy result is in some measure to be attributed. The noble and learned Lord expressed his satisfaction with the single paragraph addressed to the Gentlemen of the House of Commons with regard to expenditure—accompanying his remarks, however, with the proviso, in which we all must concur, that economy should be combined with efficiency. We have given a pledge to the country that we mean to carry out greater economy with greater efficiency, and we mean to redeem that pledge, but with moderation and prudence; and when the Estimates come to be explained in the other House of Parliament, they will be found not entirely wanting in that combination of efficiency with economy which we all desire. The noble and learned Lord has interpreted quite correctly the intentions of the Government with regard to those evils connected with the elections which, by public notoriety and by judicial reports, are proved to have existed at the last election. His first criticism was, I thought, rather a small one—that there was no precedent for a recommendation from Her Majesty's Government to the Houses of Parliament to inquire into such a matter; but he rightly gathers that it is our intention to propose such a Committee as he has sketched forth; and the recommendation of Her Majesty's Government of an inquiry appears to me, with or without precedent, to be perfectly unobjectionable. The noble and learned Lord regretted, and I deeply regret, and I think the country will deeply regret, that primary education is not one of the subjects which Her Majesty's Government feel themselves enabled to announce to Parliament this Session. If a Bill on that subject were introduced of a very simple character, like that the late Government brought in last year, it might be possible; but if it were wished that the Government should deal with this large and important question as it deserves, I believe that every one would feel it to be a mockery of Parliament to introduce such a measure as would be consistent with the importance of the subject concurrently with that other great measure which must be submitted to the other House of Parliament. Education is a most important subject with regard to Scotland; and, perhaps, with regard to this country, it may be said that middle-class education has been neglected more than the higher or than primary education. The subject of primary education is one that is dear to the country, and Her Majesty's Government are consequently most anxious to deal with the subject as soon as it can be legislated upon with efficiency and success; but the country will feel that, under the peculiar circumstances of the present Session, Her Majesty's Government are justified in not introducing such a Bill this year. The noble and learned Lord adverted to what he called "our old familiar friend," the Bankruptcy Bill, upon which I may remind him both he and the noble and learned

Lord by his side (Lord Chelmsford) have tried their hands. I trust that the hope expressed by the noble and learned Lord on this subject will be fulfilled, and that my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, taking advantage of what has already been attempted, will succeed in producing a measure on the subject that will commend itself to the attention of your Lordships and ultimately prove successful. Rather to my surprise, the noble and learned Lord seemed to be ignorant that any occupier had suffered any hardship in respect of the amended law on rating. I should have thought that no one, either learned or unlearned, could be ignorant of the complaints made all over the country of the hardships inflicted upon the poorer class of occupiers by certain portions of the late Reform Bill. No one will say that it is not a hardship upon the poor man to be called upon to pay his rates for the whole year, and then to be turned out, perhaps next morning, by a profligate landlord, who may let the house to others at a higher rent in consequence of the rates being thus paid for the whole year. This seems to me an obvious hardship which all should be anxious to remove. While I will not attempt to anticipate the provisions of the Bill which will be introduced on this subject, it will be satisfactory, I trust, to the noble and learned Lord to know that we propose to interfere as little as possible with the enactments of the Reform Bill of last year. I now come to that which the noble and learned Lord has truly described as the most important paragraph of the Queen's Speech. My noble Friends the Mover and Seconder of the Address, who are both connected with Ireland, referred with great force of conviction and eloquence to that subject. Remembering for how many hours the noble and learned Lord and myself trespassed upon your Lordships' patience on the abstract merits of the question during last Session, I think your Lordships will do well to take his advice, in waiting until the measure to be proposed is made known to the Houses of Parliament. He alluded to the early date at which it was proposed to bring this subject forward, and I may state that Notice has just been given in the other House of the introduction of a measure on the 1st of March. The noble and learned Lord also alluded to the circumstances under which the present Government came into power. I own I rather expected that he would have taken the opportunity of first explaining the circumstances under which the late Government retired from Office. I do not, however, complain of the omission, and will only express my conviction that the course pursued by the late Government, while it was extremely wise in a party view, was also useful for the national interests; because, although it gave the present Government little time to prepare their measures, yet it would have been otherwise impossible to have brought forward a Bill on the subject during the present Session if the delay of waiting for the meeting of Parliament had occurred. The noble and learned Lord referred to a subject of complaint which I have myself made when sitting on that side of the House, and which I have had to answer on this side of the House—that complaint so fairly made on the part of those in Opposition, and so feebly defended by those in power—that there should be so very little work in this House in the early part of the Session and such a great pressure of work in the latest month or two of the Session. It is a complaint which Lord Aberdeen fifteen years ago stated he remembered having heard for fifty years. It is obvious that there is some reason for this state of things, and that it arises from the fact that the peculiar province of your Lordships' House is not so much the initiative as the revision of measures. I can only say that I will endeavour to supply your Lordships with as much of the material of legislation as I can as early as possible. I have only to say, before I sit down, that I congratulate ourselves and the House upon that feeling of moderation which exists, and which has enabled me to make my first Ministerial speech a matter of very small importance.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MR. SPEAKER reported, That the House had been at the House of Peers at the desire of the Lords Commissioners appointed under the Great Seal for opening and holding this present Parliament; and that the Lord High Chancellor, being one of the said Commissioners, made a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, of which Mr. SPEAKER said he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a copy; which he read to the House.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON HER MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

MR. H. COWPER said, he must ask for the kindness and indulgence of the House while he made a few remarks, necessary to preface the Motion with which he had the high honour to be entrusted. He could assure the House that he should at all times have felt the responsibility and the difficulty of the position which he now held, but he could not help thinking that that responsibility and that difficulty were somewhat increased by the peculiar character of the Parliament which met that day virtually for the first time. He was not going to give the House a history of the last two years, of which they probably knew more than he did; but he could not forget that, among the various opinions given by anticipation of that new Parliament by the most eminent men of both parties and by the country, on this point at least they all seemed to agree—that the assembling of that Parliament would be a turning-point and the inauguration of a new epoch in the history of the country. Probably no great popular assembly ever met, upon which, not only from the time at which it was first called, but long before, so many hopes and so many fears had been lavished: the fears would, he thought, now be acknowledged to have been somewhat superfluous; while, on the other hand, all must trust that the best hopes which it had awakened might in some measure be realized, whatever might be the duration of its existence; and he was sure that hon. Members on both sides would cordially echo the sentiment expressed in Her Majesty's Speech, that "the House had been chosen with the advantage of a greater enfranchisement of her faithful and loyal people." They were informed by Her Majesty that her relations with all foreign Powers continued to be most friendly, and that she had the satisfaction to believe that they cordially shared in the desire by which she was animated for the maintenance of peace. Of late the Great Powers had certainly shown the most manifest desire for peace, by the way in which they had sought to remove the difference between Greece and Turkey before it had attained any formidable dimensions. With that subject, he supposed—the popular opinion being what it was—they wished to have as little as possible to do. They felt that their interests in that part of the world—although upon certain occurrences they might become very great—were yet at present less than with almost any other part of the earth. Again, it was difficult for them to follow out all the differences of race and religion which formed the subject-matter of that great question, and they would have been glad, if possible, that [the parties directly concerned should have been allowed to settle it for themselves. But in a great country like ours, with a great history, they must of course always reflect on what had gone before, and be prepared, with whatever cheerfulness they could, to meet the responsibilities incurred by those who had preceded them. England had a great deal to do with the formation of Greece into an independent kingdom; since then we had added to her power for good or evil by relinquishing our protectorate of the Ionian Islands, and giving them up to her; and therefore it would have been impossible for us, if the affairs of Greece became an European question, to have remained altogether silent. Nor could we regret what we had had to do if it had stood between Greece and the vengeance which might have fallen upon her, or had recalled her to some recollection of her international obligations. Her Majesty had informed them that, in conjunction with her allies, she had endeavoured, by friendly interposition, to effect a settlement of the differences which had arisen between Turkey and Greece, and she rejoiced that their joint efforts had aided in preventing any serious interruption of tranquillity in the Levant. Still speaking of foreign affairs, Her Majesty informed them that she had been "Engaged in negotiations with the United States of America for the settlement of questions which affect the interests and the international relations of the two countries."

The fact—which he believed was no mystery—for there had certainly been less mystery about these negotiations than about anything of the sort that he knew of—that the Convention had been begun in the time of the last Government, and therefore had the advantage of the consideration not only of the noble Lord the late Minister for Foreign Affairs (Lord Stanley), but of all the prominent members both of that Cabinet and of the present one, would form an additional guarantee, if such were necessary, that while we had gone to the very fullest extent we possibly could to obtain a friendly settlement of those questions, yet no consideration had been spared to maintain the interests, and of course the honour of England. They did not yet know how the Convention would be received in America, and the most contradictory rumours reached them daily as to its probable reception by the Senate; but it would, he thought, be well for Englishmen to recollect that it was much easier for them to approach that question in a spirit of moderation and candour than for the Americans. If the matter was decided against us, we should pay the costs without much reluctance; we should be glad that a tiresome and vexatious business had been brought to a close; and perhaps the strongest regret we should feel would be that the nation should have to pay, and not those gentlemen who had attempted to make their fortune at the expense of their country, and also at the risk of her reputation for good faith. But with America the case was very different. The Americans, if there had been any injury at all, were the injured party, and if they were injured at all, they had been greatly injured. It was not, of course, for him to give an opinion as to whether those cruizers had escaped by any negligence on our part—that point would have to be determined by those to whom the question was referred; but at the same time he might say that, if certain reports of private conversations that they had seen were correct, there was not much doubt entertained upon the subject in the minds of those who ought to be best informed. If an injury was committed upon America, it was a very serious one, because it amounted to her whole commerce being swept from the seas, and her carrying trade driven into our ships. They could not, therefore, be surprised if the irritation, which had naturally been raised at the time in America, had not yet been quite allayed, even though several years had since elapsed. It was also to be remembered that those who were most anxious to settle the question had difficulties to contend with which it was not easy to appreciate, and hence those gusts of popular sentiment in America which reached us at intervals, disconcerting all plans that were proposed for settlement and leaving things very much as they were. But Her Majesty expressed her and such a result, he was sure, would rejoice not only every man in that House, but every friend of the happiness and progress of mankind. Her Majesty next referred to the disturbances in New Zealand, but he did not see in the paragraph any intention expressed on the part of the Government either to send out troops, or in any way to take a backward step from the decision come to, that the defence of the colonies should be left to the colonists themselves. In this, he thought, so far as he was able to express any opinion upon the subject, Her Majesty's Government were quite right. The disturbances were of an exceptional character. As long as the troops were kept in the colony, the colonists did as everybody else would have done in the like case—they trusted to those troops; and after they had been withdrawn the colonists did not at first organize and drill a force capable of resisting the last outbreak of the Maories. But he did not think it would be a difficult thing for them ultimately to do so. Probably the Maories were as fine fighting men as any British settlers had had to meet; but the Europeans in New Zealand far outnumbered them, and ought not to find any difficulty in organizing among themselves the means of averting the recurrence of any further outbreaks of that kind. Carefully guarding himself from either implying or seeming to imply that any provocation had been given to the Natives on that unfortunate occasion, yet this general principle might be laid down, that the temptation to quarrel with, or oppress, or deceive the Natives, would be much diminished if those who otherwise might succumb to those temptations had the consciousness that they would be the first called upon to bear the responsibility of any untoward eventualities. It must be extremely satisfactory to the House to learn, on the authority of Her Majesty's Government, that it would probably not be necessary to renew the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. They had been more or less prepared for that announcement by the fact that, during the last few months, they had heard of much fewer disturbances in Ireland than had occurred previously; whilst the dark cloud, which had now passed away, hung over Ireland,

"Earnest hope that the result of these negotiations might be to place on a firm and durable

it was necessary to suspend the most obvious right of free citizens. As long as this dark cloud had hung over Ireland, all plans and schemes to improve the permanent condition of the country seemed mere dreams; but it may be trusted now that, cheered by this ray of hope, the friends of Ireland would be encouraged to renewed exertions on her behalf. The House would also gather from Her Majesty's Speech that it was the intention of the Government to open an inquiry into the present mode of conducting Parliamentary and municipal elections, with a view to discover "whether it may be possible to provide further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom." It must be confessed that the present arrangements in respect to that matter were made for a very different state of things from that which now existed under an enlarged suffrage, and had, therefore, in many cases, become either useless or ineffectual. Probably one of the first points which might have to be considered in connection with this, would be the suggestion made, he believed by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) in one of his hustling speeches—namely, whether it would not be a good thing if the ceremony of the nomination day were done away with. Certainly it would be necessary to go far back in our history to find a time when the ceremony of the nomination day answered the purpose for which it was ostensibly intended—that was, to give the constituency an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the opinions of the candidates. He had no doubt that a certain number of the voters would feel a great unwillingness to forego the intense intellectual gratification of hooting the candidates to whom they were opposed; but he believed the greater number of the wiser and more orderly class of electors would be ready to surrender that doubtful privilege for the sake of the gain to the public peace which would ensue from the sacrifice, in the more quiet and easy way of conducting the business of elections. He might add, that the question of the Ballot, and the reception which it would meet with in that House, if any Motion were made on the subject—and he believed a Notice of such a Motion had been given that night—would depend upon the results of the inquiry to which he referred. There were, he understood, many hon. Gentlemen in that House who were opposed to the Ballot, or, at least, not friendly to it, who would yet feel obliged to accept it if it were proved to them that there was no other way of stopping intimidation and violence at elections. If a change in that state of things could be brought about by the kindly growth of public opinion on the subject, so that it would become impossible for landlords to coerce tenants, for manufacturers to coerce labourers, and for customers to coerce or attempt to coerce the tradesmen with whom they dealt, it would no doubt be well to wait for such a development of public opinion, even if it should be necessary to wait for some years, rather than resort to a mere mechanical process for stopping corruption and intimidation. If, however, the inquiry proved, as it possibly might, that intimidation and force at elections, instead of being on the decrease, was rather on the increase, and if, instead of public opinion demanding that every man should vote according to his real and conscientious convictions, independently of all other considerations, it should be ascertained that the opinion was beginning to prevail more widely than before that everybody who had social relations with a voter, either as a master or spiritual adviser, or as a customer, ought to exercise his power—in such a case he thought they would be obliged with some reluctance to accept the Ballot. He was sure the House would be pleased to hear that municipal elections were also to be included in the proposed inquiry. Unhappily, it had become too notorious that bribery had prevailed at municipal elections, not only to a greater extent than at Parliamentary elections, but probably also to a greater extent than at any previous period. It was high time for the Legislature to take up the question and see if something might not be done to put a stop to so grave an abuse. It would not be necessary for him to take up the time of the House by discussing many of those particular Bills of which notice had been given. He might be permitted, however, as a county Member, to express his great gratification that the question of Financial Boards was about to be taken up by the Government, and that the principle of representation would be applied to the control of the county rate. In the course of his inquiries on this subject he had never heard any really well-authenticated accusation brought against the committees appointed by the magistrates at Quarter Sessions of in any way misappropriating or misapplying the monies over which they had control. It had, indeed, always seemed to him a circumstance very much to the credit of the class from which magistrates were generally taken that gentlemen could be found who, for no pecuniary or social advantage—without the hope of additional prestige—should be willing to take upon themselves the laborious duties to which he referred. But our principle had always been that representation and taxation should go together, and if the ratepayers in all parts of the kingdom expressed, as he believed they had done, a desire to have a share in the control of the rates which they themselves provided he did not see how, in common justice, such a claim could be refused. The last part of Her Majesty's Speech was taken up with a reference to Ireland and the Irish Church. Now, he confessed he had the greatest diffidence and reluctance in approaching this subject. He knew how well-worn the common stock arguments on the subject were, and he supposed that almost every hon. Gentleman in the House had himself made four or five speeches on the subject, and had probably heard as many or more made by others. They would scarcely thank him, therefore, for dragging them along so well-worn a road and reiterating stale arguments; and he confessed that when one left these main arguments the difficulties which presented themselves were so grave that he, for one, should be content to leave them in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government. (Cheers from the Opposition.) Hon. Gentlemen opposite must not think that those who sat on his side did not know what difficulties faced them, though with them the wish was not father to the thought that the difficulties would prove insuperable. The case stood thus:—The Liberal party, under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman, and mainly in consequence of his teaching, had come to the conclusion that the Irish Church was one of the main obstacles to the contentment and peace of Ireland. Whether it were looked upon as a practical grievance, or if it was admitted that by custom, or even by direct enactment of the law, some of the more obvious injustices involved in forcing the Church of a small minority on the nation had been mitigated, and it assumed the form of a sentimental grievance, that grievance, whether sentimental or practical, should be done away with. Some hon. Gentlemen perceived a great distinction between practical and sentimental grievances. For himself, he was hardly able to follow them entirely on this point, for it seemed to him that half the wars in the world had arisen from sentimental grievances, which had also given rise to far more than that proportion of private quarrels. Among any high-spirited body of men a slight or insult which would be regarded as sentimental was as much brooded over and as keenly resented as a blow, which he supposed would be considered a practical grievance. To go to a high-spirited, brave, generous, and, perhaps, more sensitive people than ourselves, and to say to them, "You must put up with what you complain of, because it does not affect your persons or your purses, but only your sense of personal equality and dignity," seemed to be the wildest piece of consolation ever offered. Of course, there were difficulties lying in the way—such as that of knowing what to do with the money. If State control were withdrawn, it must be decided what control was to be established over the Bishops and clergy who would be turned adrift; but taking into consideration the large amount of statesmanlike ability, practical knowledge of the subject, and legal skill which doubtless existed in the House, and also taking into consideration the fact that all these various points would be discussed in the House, he believed that so much common sense would be brought and converged on the Irish question that it need not be regarded as hopeless, nor need it occupy the attention of Parliament so long as was feared, or hoped, by some people. Happily, as the injury of a sentimental grievance lay in the intention of offending, so the intention of reparation, if honestly professed, was of itself an atonement. For his own part, he believed that no nobler message of reconciliation had been ever sent from one divided part of a country to another than that implied by the attitude of the Liberal party at the late elections. He believed it would be accepted as such, not, perhaps, by those desperate men who took part in Fenianism, but by that large and important body of men who, if they took no part in Fenianism, held aloof from the movement because they disapproved, not of the end but of the means, and who had arrived solemnly at the conclusion that the greatest evil which had ever befallen Ireland was her connection with England. Those people had recognized this attempt of England to retrace her steps, to do despite to her national want of sympathy and imagination, to put herself in the position of the Irish people, and to judge the Irish question from their point of view; and from this they anticipated an era of hope. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to thank Her Majesty for the Most Gracious Speech delivered by Her Command to both Houses of Parliament :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that Her relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be most friendly, and to express our satisfaction at learning that they cordially share in the desire by which She is animated for the maintenance of Peace :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us of Her Majesty's endeavours, in concurrence with Her Allies, to effect a settlement of the difficulties which have arisen between Turkey and Greece, and to express the gratification with which we learn that these joint efforts have aided in preventing any serious interruption of tranquillity in the Levant :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has been engaged in Negotiations with the United States of North America for the settlement of questions which affect the interests and the international relations of the two Countries, and to assure Her Majesty that we share in the earnest hope that the result of the Negotiations may be to place on a firm and durable basis the friendship which should ever exist between England and America :

“To assure Her Majesty that we have learnt with grief that disturbances have occurred in New Zealand, and that at one spot they have been attended with circumstances of atrocity; and that we participate in Her Majesty's confidence that the Colonial Government and people will not be wanting either in energy to repress the outbreaks, or in the prudence and moderation which we trust will prevent their recurrence :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for directing that the Estimates for the expenditure of the coming financial year should be submitted to us, and to express our satisfaction at learning that while they have been framed with a careful regard to the efficiency of the Services, they will exhibit a diminished Charge on the Country :

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we rejoice to learn that the condition of Ireland leads Her Majesty to believe that we may be spared the painful necessity, which was felt by the late Parliament, for narrowing the securities of personal liberty in that Country by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act :

“To express our readiness to inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and to consider whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantee for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that measures will be brought under our notice for the relief of some classes of occupiers from hardships in respect of Rating, which appear to be capable of remedy; for the extension and improvement of Education in Scotland; for rendering the considerable revenues of the Endowed Schools of England more widely effectual for the purposes of instruction; and for applying the principle of representation to the control of the County Rate, by the establishment of Financial Boards for Counties :

“To thank Her Majesty for informing us that we shall be invited to recur to the subject of Bankruptcy, with a view to the more effective Distribution of Assets, and to the abolition of Imprisonment for Debt :

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that our serious attention will be given to the Ecclesiastical Arrangements for Ireland, and to the legislation which will be necessary in order to their final adjustment; and that in the prosecution of the work, we shall bear a careful regard to every legitimate interest which it may involve, and that we shall be governed by the constant aim to promote the welfare of Religion through the principles of equal Justice, to secure the action of the undivided feeling and opinion of Ireland on the side of Loyalty and Law, to efface the memory of former contentions, and to cherish the sympathies of an affectionate People :

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that, with Her, we fervently pray that the Almighty may, in this, as in every matter of public interest, never cease to guide our deliberations, and that He may bring them to a happy issue.”

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was sure the House would believe him when he said it was with no conventional humility nor assumed difficulty that he rose for the first time within those walls to address hon. Members. He trusted he should experience at their hands the same indulgence which they were accustomed to accord to those who addressed the House for the first time. When he was elected a Member of the House he formed a resolution not to trespass upon its attention unless he had a practical knowledge and acquaintance with the subject under discussion, and unless it seemed to him important that he should state his opinions upon it. When the honour of seconding the Address was unexpectedly conferred upon him he felt that it was owing, not to any personal reputation attaching to him, but to the circumstance that he was the representative of a large constituency, and that he had been selected by the working classes of that constituency to represent them in Parliament. Probably there had never been so many grave and important questions laid before Parliament in a Speech from the Throne as in the Address which Her Majesty had delivered that day.

When the Reform Bill of 1832 was passed many people were apprehensive as to the results to the security of the institutions of the country, and as to the effect on our legislation. He believed, however, it was now admitted on all hands that the legislation since that time had been wise, wholesome, beneficent, and stimulant; and it might be therefore fairly assumed that the larger measure of Reform passed the Session before last would result in an increase of security to our institutions, and give the same satisfaction to the people of the country that had characterized the first Reform Bill. Speaking as a representative of a large constituency of working men, he might make a remark which could not be gainsaid. It was that never in his experience, and never probably in the history of this country, were the people of this country, as a mass, so loyal to the Throne and institutions of the country as at the present time. Whatever might be the grievances, real or supposed, of the working classes of this country, it was to that House they looked for redress. It was to that House and the Constitutional means which it afforded them they looked for all the beneficial changes they desired.

Her Majesty's Speech assured Parliament of the peaceable relations of this nation with foreign Powers. The people would receive that assurance with satisfaction, because peace would enable us to develop a beneficial home policy. It would enable us to improve our legislation, to enlighten our people, and devote our attention to those great social questions which at this moment were awaiting solution.

The Estimates referred to in the Royal Speech were stated to be framed with a careful regard to the efficiency of the public service, and it would be satisfactory to the House and to the country to know that they would show a diminished charge upon the public. He believed that if there was one question in which more than another the people of this kingdom felt interested, it was that of economy. While there was no desire and no need of parsimony, the nation did certainly desire efficiency combined with economy. Large reductions in the public expenditure would conduce to considerable reduction in taxation, and this would, it was believed, lead to no slight diminution of that pauperism, the existence of which was at this moment felt to be so great an evil.

He rejoiced greatly at the promised inquiry into the mode of conducting Parliamentary and municipal elections. He rejoiced that the word municipal was coupled with Parliamentary, because for years past there had been boroughs in which no election had been carried on its own merits, but in which bribery had always prevailed irrespective of the qualifications and characters of the candidates. He was aware of a case in which a sum of £10,000 had been spent in carrying a single municipal election; and, in some towns, during the last twenty years, there had been no contested election decided on its own merits. It was his opinion that the country had arrived at a conclusion that electoral freedom and purity of election could only be secured by the Ballot. He believed, therefore, that it would not be long before the country was congratulating the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) on the success of the measure which that hon. Gentleman had for so many years advocated in the House of Commons.

The Speech from the Throne further announced that a measure would be brought forward for the relief of some classes of occupiers from hardships in respect of Rating. The rate-paying clauses of the Reform Act were, no doubt, alluded to in that passage. He was sure that when the House was enacting those clauses it never intended or expected they would work such hardships as had resulted from them. He held in his hand a letter from the President of the Chamber of Commerce of Birmingham, in which it was stated that the Guardians of the parish of Birmingham had resolved to petition Parliament on the subject. It appeared that in connection with the levy of the May rate in that parish 15,000 summonses and 5,000 distress warrants had been issued, and that no fewer than 6,000 persons had applied to be excused from payment of the rates on the ground of abject poverty. Mr. Wright, the gentleman referred to, said that it was impossible to overrate the suffering which had been inflicted on the population of Birmingham by the abolition of compounding. It had made the very name of Reform to be cursed by large numbers of poor people, who felt that its effect was to impose a penalty on them for the exercise of the franchise. It also acted with peculiar injustice on single women. In other boroughs there had been the greatest difficulty and labour imposed upon overseers and rate-collectors, while there had been increased cost of collection and great loss of rates. He was glad, therefore, that the House would shortly be called upon to do justice in this respect.

They found that their attention was to be invited to Bills for the extension and improvement of education in Scotland, and for rendering the considerable revenues of the Endowed Schools more widely effectual for the purposes of instruction. Every one ought to rejoice that Scotland, which had always been forward in education, would be enabled to complete her educational system. The parochial schools were no longer equal to the exigencies of the day, and in the large towns an immense mass of the poorer classes of the population were receiving no education. He understood that Boards were to be instituted for the purpose of making sufficient provision for education in districts where at present there was not that provision. The Endowed Schools of England was a subject which required the gravest attention of the House. There was no doubt, from the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission, that the greatest possible abuses existed in the Endowed Schools of this country. He had known a case of a small school endowed for the education of thirty poor children twenty years ago, where the parishioners in their wisdom, not having a schoolmaster at hand, had taken a man who had been working on the roads and appointed him; and he was the schoolmaster to this day, irresponsible and irremovable. He would be glad to see exhibitions opened to clever boys in national and elementary schools. Such encouragements would promote habits which would give boys an aptitude for business.

They found that Parliament was promised a Bill on the subject of Bankruptcy. If there was a commercial question on which commercial men felt strongly, it was on the gross inefficiency of the Bankruptcy Laws. Our Bankruptcy Laws had done much to injure the reputation and credit of this country abroad, while they had entirely failed in punishing the great criminals who sinned against the principles of honest trading. The small trader whose guilt was of the open and vulgar kind was perhaps punished; but the large trader, who by subtle proceedings managed to defraud his creditors on a grand scale, escaped with comparative immunity, and was set free to renew his depredations on society over and over again. Without pretending to know anything of the details of the promised Bankruptcy Bill, he thought he might assume that it would in its principles approximate to the Scotch system, which gave great satisfaction in Scotland. While 12½ per cent was sufficient to realize the assets in a Scotch bankruptcy, in this country nearly three times that percentage was required. It would, therefore, be a great satisfaction to the commercial community of England to know that there would be a Bill to amend our Bankruptcy Law.

He should not detain the House on the subject of the Irish Church—a question which the hon. Mover of the Address had treated with so much ability. What had already been said on it in the House of Commons had been sufficient to induce the country to come to a decision. In principle, the question might be taken to be settled. All that remained to be done was to settle the details. This would be done by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government (Mr. Gladstone). He ventured to hope that in regard to Ireland there would be legislation which would tend to make that country one with England and Scotland — one with them in its institutions, and one with them in respect for the honour, the laws, and the liberty of the British Empire. In conclusion, he would also express a hope that the Reformed Parliament — which had now commenced its sittings — would enact such laws as would conduce to the security of the Throne, the honour of the State, and the prosperity and happiness of the people. The hon. Gentleman concluded by seconding the Address.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That," &c.—[See Page 61.]

MR. DISRAELI: I am glad, Sir, to find that the hon. Gentleman who has made this Motion has so framed the Address, in answer to the Speech, that he has not asked the opinion of the House upon any controverted question. The salutary rule which he has followed has obtained of late years in our proceedings, and its observance has been attended with considerable advantage. Generally speaking, our proceedings have been conducted in a manner satisfactory to both sides since that rule was established; but there are circumstances attending the relations between Her Majesty's Government and the present House of Commons which just now render the adoption of that rule particularly convenient, and one which I think the House ought to approve. Her Majesty's Government have acceded to power, in consequence of the unmistakable declaration of the constituencies that they wished the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends to be intrusted with the opportunity of dealing with a question, no doubt, of great difficulty; and, in my opinion, it would be unjust, equally to the Government and to this House, if we were to allow ourselves to be drawn into a partial and desultory discussion on a question which ought to be placed before us in a complete form, and upon which we ought to have the advantage of the responsibility and knowledge which result from a Ministerial exposition. Considering the circumstances under which the present Administration was formed, no Government, in dealing with the question of the Church in Ireland, could possibly have come before the House with a stronger primâ facie claim to a full and candid consideration of the question; and as the right hon. Gentleman has very properly given Notice that he will on an early day invite the attention of the House to the subject, I would confine myself at present to expressing a hope that when that statement is made it will be received by the House, and will be considered by the House with the gravity worthy its importance, and calculated to maintain the reputation of this Assembly.

Sir, I am sure that the House heard from the Throne, with entire satisfaction, the description of the relations which subsist between Her Majesty and foreign Powers, and that the House will echo the answer made in the Address. These relations are described — and I have no doubt truly described — as being of the most friendly character, and as long as those relations are conducted, not upon the principle of selfish isolation, but one of sympathy with the fortunes, with the progress, and prosperity of other nations, or even with those troubled conditions of things which sometimes must occur — those friendly relations will, I believe, be maintained. It is, I am quite sure, a matter of great and just congratulation to Her Majesty that, by her friendly interposition, and that of her Majesty's allies, the settlement of the difficulty between Greece and Turkey has probably been brought about. That, in the gracious Speech from the Throne, we are not informed of the particular mode in which that friendly interposition was brought to bear is, to me, a matter of regret. When so considerable an event as a Conference between the Great Powers has occurred upon a matter which might have led to a European war, and when the Sovereign of this country was represented in that Conference, I think it is almost without precedent that no notice should be taken of the subject in the Speech from the Throne, and that the occurrence of so considerable an event should not be brought before the consideration of Parliament. I would even frankly admit that I wish we had been thus officially informed that the Conference had been held, because had that been done we should have been promised Papers, and, therefore, we should have had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the reasons why that Conference was agreed to. At present, I confess, I do not clearly comprehend the cause of that Conference, because the friendly interposition of Her Majesty and her allies might have been made in the usual diplomatic manner, and I cannot doubt that if the expression of their opinions and feelings had been properly conveyed, the same result would have happened. I do not, however, care to be critical upon this matter, because the result is one which the House must regard as highly satisfactory. The independence of Turkey has been asserted, and asserted by the Porte itself, appealing to the spirit of public law and the opinion of Europe. Founded on that appeal the Porte has vindicated its authority, and I think the general opinion is that a sound and just policy has been successfully asserted by a Power in whose welfare England is undoubtedly interested. I trust that among the not least favourable consequences will be that the organized system by which the Porte has been continually assailed of late will probably cease, that this considerable check will afford a moral lesson to the habitual disturbers of the peace in that quarter of the world, and that the Turkish Government will have the opportunity of devoting its energies to the development of the resources of that country, still for its richness unrivalled, and in which, I believe, they will find the best mode of extricating themselves from financial difficulties, which, though considerable, are not more so than those of many other countries.

The hon. Gentleman very properly dilated upon the relations between this country and the United States of America. I should have been very glad if it had been in the power of Her Majesty's Government to announce to us to-day that the Convention between the two countries had been ratified by the Senate; but it at least remains for us to express our more than hope that that ratification will take place, anticipated as it is by men of wise and temperate opinion on both sides of the Atlantic; and that thus an act will occur that will terminate a long misunderstanding between two countries deeply interested not only in each other's fortunes, but associated with each other by feelings of mutual affection and respect.

I was glad to observe in a short, but important, paragraph in the Address, that our attention is called to the preparation of the Estimates for the coming financial year, and that in this instance the principle, which, though the right one, has not been invariably followed, is to be observed, that they are to be framed "with a careful regard to the efficiency" of the public service. I am convinced that the mere curtailment of expenditure without reference to efficiency is one of the unwise courses which it is possible to adopt; because the inevitable result is that it leads to a great reaction of profusion, and that you subsequently find you have as large an expenditure as you had before the reduction, with the additional disadvantage of an inefficient service in the interval. I, therefore, highly approve that the reductions are to be made on the principle of efficiency, and I have no doubt that, guided by that principle, the result will be satisfactory to the public.

I am not surprised to find that Her Majesty's Government will not ask for a renewal of the extraordinary powers by which the rights of the Irish people have of late years been occasionally suspended. It is a subject upon which, of all others, we must be guided by the opinion of the existing Government of the day—we must be guided by the opinion of those who at the same time are in possession of the most authentic information on the subject, which we, who are in a mere private position, cannot obtain, and who are under a consciousness of responsibility that we cannot for a moment share. I have no doubt that the Government have well considered this subject, and that they have taken a wise course, whatever may be the result, in what they have intimated to us to-day. Now, this leads me to a paragraph on which several observations have been made by the hon. Gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address, and it is one which, I think, requires some little explanation. When I read that paragraph and found that we were recommended to inquire into the present mode of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, I confess I could not help feeling that it was involved in some degree of ambiguity. But reading it with the interpretation which we have received from the hon. Mover and Seconder of the Address, I collect this—that Her Majesty's Government propose to appoint Parliamentary Committees in both Houses to inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and to consider whether it may be possible to provide any "further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom." Now, Sir, if I am right, I cannot refrain from observing upon what, according to my experience, appears to be a very unusual course,—namely, that Her Majesty's Government, when they found inquiry necessary upon any subject, should put the statement of the fact into the mouth of the Sovereign, without being prepared to propose on it a Royal Commission. If it is not a case for a Royal Commission, and if Her Majesty's Ministers think a Parliamentary inquiry sufficient, I do not think that this is a matter which ought to be announced in a Royal Speech, but would have been more properly brought under our notice in the ordinary course of business in the House. One remark upon this idea of considering "whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantees for" the "tranquillity, purity, and freedom" of Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and I confine myself to Parliamentary elections. We must remember that last year we passed an Election Act, and, whatever doubt may have been entertained then as to the policy of it, I think no one now can doubt it has provided further guarantees for "tranquillity, purity, and freedom." I think the results of the legislation of last year in all respects, as read from the table this evening, in interesting detail, must have convinced every one that that one Act has already produced very considerable effect. I would say more than that; I think that the public opinion of the country has recognized, from the experience of late elections, and from the application of that Act to the elections, the fact that at last we have obtained, if not an adequate, if not a complete—and I leave that open for future discussion—yet a very considerable guarantee for the "tranquillity, purity, and freedom" of our elections. It would be wise, to my mind, to give that Act fair play, because one thing is quite clear, and it is that none of us will be able to appreciate, sufficiently estimate, and comprehend the influence of the Election Act of last year until there has been another General Election. It will be at the next General Election you will find out the beneficial consequences of the searching and satisfactory inquiries which are now carried on under this Act. I think that every impartial man on both sides of the House must agree that, by the legislation of last year, we have at last obtained a very considerable guarantee for the purity and freedom of our elections; and, in my opinion, it would be a very wise course to watch the progress of that Act, and to take care that it has a fair opportunity of effecting what it was intended to do, and which, I think, so far as we can see, it has so satisfactorily accomplished.

There is one paragraph in the Speech which I read with some regret, and that is the paragraph which refers to education. No doubt the subject of Scotch education deserves attention—the late Government had prepared a Bill on the subject—and no doubt a measure by which the revenues which still exist for the purpose of education, and which are so little utilized, may be rendered more effectual would be approved. But I regret very much to see that in this portion of the Speech there is no longer any mention made of a general measure of popular education. I cannot say I think that the circumstances which at present exist render such legislation on our part less necessary—I would say less urgent—than a year ago; and I am surprised to find that Her Majesty's Government seem to be of opinion that this is a subject which can be avoided. I regret very much that the measure introduced last year, not, indeed, as a complete measure, but yet one which would have been an advance, was not passed. I did not regret so much that it was not passed last year; for I thought, whoever might be Minister, it would be impossible for this Session to lapse without a general measure of education. Omitted as it is now, no longer noticed in the Speech of the Royal Commissioners, and of course not in the Address, and with the prospect which we have before us of our time being occupied with subjects which, however happily treated they may be, must lead, I think, to much debate and discussion, I regret to feel that the progress of any measure of public education appears to me now to be postponed I would almost say sine die. There are other measures of importance mentioned by Her Majesty's Government which I am sure the country would be glad to see dealt with during the course of the present Session. Many of them, like that relating to Bankruptcy, have for a long time occupied attention, and have been matured, I have no doubt, by the thought and experience of many who are Members of this House. I trust under any circumstances we shall be able to dispose of the particular question of Bankruptcy in the course of the present Session. There is no doubt Her Majesty's Government have to deal with considerable questions, and they have to deal with one of the gravest and most difficult a Ministry can entertain. To effect the fresh financial arrangements founded upon the sound principle which they have announced in the Royal Speech they have necessarily to bring forward measures which will demand much attention; and no doubt they will have to depend very much upon the forbearance, the assiduity, and the patience of the House in order to effect the progress of public measures. We have been reminded by the hon. Gentleman who moved the Address that the Government have to appeal to a House formed of new materials—and a new House necessarily is in a great degree inexperienced; but I hope I may be permitted to express my firm conviction that, though the materials of the House may be novel, the country will find that the legislation which has led to the introduction of that novel material was not a mistake; that this House will not be less efficient than those that have preceded it; and that, both in the fair manner in which its Members will consider questions and the business-like method in which they will apply themselves to carry any great Bills which may be necessary, they will so conduct themselves as to maintain the reputation of this House and win the confidence of the country.

MR. WHITE said, he would interpose only for a moment between the House and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), but he could not forbear remarking that he thought there was an omission in the Royal Speech. He felt something akin to disappointment that no reference was made to the great events which had recently occurred in Spain. Every friend of civil and religious liberty must have watched with peculiar interest the changes which had taken place in the Peninsula; if the comity of nations was to be considered a thing of value in our political life, it was matter of regret that no reference had been made to the conduct of the Provisional Government and the people of Spain; and he believed that courtesy and kindness were as acceptable in public as they were in private life. He was not eccentric or hypercritical in making these remarks, because when the King of Naples was expelled from his dominions in the autumn of 1860, in the Speech delivered from the Throne in 1861 Parliament was told—

“Events of great Importance are taking place in Italy. Believing that the Italians ought to be left to settle their own Affairs, I have not thought it right to exercise any active Interference in those Matters.”

He should have been much pleased with a similar declaration on this occasion in reference to Spain, because the Spanish people were high-spirited and brave, and were once a great people. Seeing that through so many years of traditional misgovernment they still cherished a high national spirit, he thought a recognition of the fact would have been acceptable to them, and worthy of an Assembly like this, whose boast was that it teaches the nations how to live.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, to offer some explanations to the House upon points which have been raised in the speeches we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) and from my hon. Friend (Mr. White) on this side; but there is nothing in the character of the occasion or of the speeches which can render it necessary for me to trespass for any length of time upon your attention. I think the House will agree with me that my hon. Friend who has proposed this Address acquitted himself of the task with marked ability; and my hon. Friend who seconded the Address, although he pleaded with so much modesty, in the introduction to his sound and judicious remarks, for the indulgence of the House, may, I feel confident, rest assured that not only the importance of the constituency he represents, and not only the fact that the class of working men very largely contributed to his return, but likewise the intelligent interest he has taken in the solution of questions of the greatest interest and importance to the community will at all times secure for him the friendly and kind attention of this House. Sir, in the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), especially so far as they had reference to the most important of all the subjects likely to engage our attention during the Session, I have found not only nothing to complain of, but nothing except what betokened a spirit of moderation and a tone entirely worthy of the high position which he holds. If, therefore, I remark upon his comments in a controversial tone, with a view to satisfy—I will not say so much the objections he took as the scruples he has expressed, it must not be taken that I speak in a spirit of complaint. But I will first deal with the observation of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White), who regretted the absence from Her Majesty's Message of any reference to the revolution in Spain. My hon. Friend justly observed in his remarks that the revolution in the kingdom of Naples in 1860 formed a not improper subject of mention in the next following Speech of Her Majesty; but he will recollect that the Neapolitan revolution of 1860 was immediately followed by the most unequivocal signs of popular and general approval, and by the establishment of a Government which appeared to us to present the promise of stability; and my hon. Friend is aware that the revolution in Spain has not up to this time led to that desirable result. It seems, therefore, hardly expedient, that, on the one hand, we should, through the mouth of Her Majesty, invite Parliament to express satisfaction with a work as yet incomplete—since, although it has passed through its destructive stage, it has not yet reached its constructive stage—or, on the other hand, that we should run the risk, by a reference in bolder terms, of being thought indisposed to sympathize with the feelings of the Spanish people, which undoubtedly do to a very great extent command the strong sympathy both of the Government and the people of this country. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman takes something like exception to the paragraph referring to the differences between Turkey and

Greece, on the ground, if I understood him rightly, of its omission of any reference to the causes which led the Government to become a party to the assembling of the Conference. Now, Sir, the reason this paragraph has been couched in general rather than pointed terms is that, although we think the end in view has been substantially gained, we cannot as yet say it has been formally attained. The envoy despatched by the French Government to Athens as the bearer of the resolution of the Conference had, according to the latest intelligence which has reached me, arrived at Marseilles upon his return, but we are not at this moment, though we may be within the next four-and-twenty hours, cognizant of the exact nature of the intelligence he brings. And, with respect to the assembling of the Conference, I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that the best opportunity which can be given to the House of forming an opinion upon the subject will be the time when we are able to present the Papers that relate to it. Until the answer of the King of the Greeks has been received, and that answer has been found to be of such a character as to permit the Conference to declare itself formally discharged of its office, and in consequence dissolved, we should not be justified in assuming, however we may hope and believe it to be so, that the whole question was at an end, or in promising to produce the Papers having reference to the subject. I cannot pass over this paragraph of the Speech without allowing myself the satisfaction of dwelling for one moment upon the nature of these transactions. It is not to claim for Her Majesty's Government, nor for this country, any special credit or applause for what has occurred; it is rather to record and take note of what appears to me to be a sign of some real advance in civilization. Here, Sir, is a case where two Powers, exasperated by traditional animosities, and with their respective transactions entangled by various sympathies and antipathies of race, were on the point of resorting to the arbitration of force and bloodshed for the settlement of their differences—and where the employment of purely moral influence has been sufficient to avert that calamity. Now, I am quite certain that if there exists one sentiment more unequivocal than another on both sides of this House, and on every bench of it, and throughout the country, it is that, without resorting to arbitrary doctrines or pedantic rules, we may be enabled quietly and steadily to make progress towards establishing in Europe a state of feeling which shall favour and facilitate that common action among the Powers of Europe whereby, becoming the organ of legitimate and strong opinion, they may be able by this kind of influence alone to avert the great calamity of war. What is required for that common action is the absence of intrigue and a total repudiation on the part of every Power concerned of narrow and selfish views. It is but justice to the Powers engaged in these recent transactions that I should state, on the part of my Colleagues and myself, how fully we acknowledge that entire singleness of view and of purpose, that simple prosecution of great public objects, by which every one of those Powers has been governed in the negotiations. With respect to the Government of France, it is, happily, no novelty that that Government should be allied with that of England in an especial manner with respect to the settlement of affairs in the East. With respect to Prussia, it was Prussia that perhaps principally suggested the method of proceeding by Conference. With respect to Austria and Italy, their conduct has been actuated by precisely the same spirit as that of the Powers I have named; and no one could suspect from anything which has occurred that the result had ever been made the battlefield of conflicting interests and pretensions. The position of Russia was singular, inasmuch as she had the power by her single dissent to baffle the whole proceedings and frustrate the peaceful object of the other Powers; but although a question has been raised—perhaps justly—with respect to the conduct of a diplomatic agent of Russia, which has not appeared to the world to be in complete conformity with the specific intentions of the Imperial Government, it is but common justice to that Government to admit that its influence has been used in the most positive and decided, and in the fairest and most respectful manner to bring about the acquiescence of interested Powers in a result to which they were naturally somewhat reluctant, but which, at the same time, their best friends believed to be a result conformable with their true interests. And, not least of all, it must be admitted that the Porte, which had suffered injury at the hands of Greece on grounds of International Law, had substantial cause of complaint respecting which it was entitled, if thought fit, to make use of its undoubtedly superior material means. It should, therefore, receive credit at the hands of this House for having been content to forego what in other times and under other circumstances might have been supposed to be a great advantage, and to place its cause in the hands of its allies, reposing entire confidence in the justice of the motives from which they acted. Nor do I think that the King of the Greeks should be entirely omitted from our consideration of what has occurred. He has had serious internal difficulties to contend with, and it is gratifying to find that, at this early period of his life, he has shown himself capable of appreciating national interests, and especially the conditions of national honour and national dignity. It is not necessary to dwell at any length upon the paragraph relating to America; we have endeavoured to be very careful in the statement we have made, and it is not to be supposed, simply because that paragraph expresses no overweening confidence, that we entertain the smallest doubt that the same good sense and good feeling which governed the course of those negotiations under the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) and the American Executive will continue to govern the policy of that great country. The right hon. Gentleman has also adverted to the paragraph recommending inquiry into the present mode of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections; and in the first place he puts a construction upon it, and next he expresses apprehension of the tendency he thinks may be ascribed to the measure he supposes to be contemplated. The proper construction to be put upon the paragraph is not precisely what the right hon. Gentleman supposes. When Her Majesty's Government recommends to Parliament inquiry into a particular subject, I think I stand on the ground of precedent when I say it by no means implies that that inquiry will be made in both Houses. In fact, it is not in the power of Her Majesty, conformably with the ordinary course of business, when she makes a promise to Parliament respecting inquiries or measures, to guarantee absolutely the fulfilment of that promise in both Houses. For instance, a measure is promised with respect to Bankruptcy. That measure will be introduced in one House; but what guarantee have we that it will ever go before the other? I think I may say, with respect to this inquiry, that a recommendation of this kind is perfectly satisfied in its meaning and intention if the Government be prepared, as it will be prepared upon its responsibility, to recommend that the inquiry be taken up and prosecuted either in the one House or the other. Without saying, therefore, that the inquiry is beyond the cognizance or jurisdiction of the other House, if they thought fit to make it a matter of investigation, it is obvious that its object and scope belong to this House, which has naturally the deepest interest in the matter. The right hon. Gentleman is, I think, not well founded in his criticism when he states that the opinion of Her Majesty's Government being in favour of inquiry, the subject ought to be committed to a Royal Commission, or else ought to be kept to themselves until they make a Motion in this House. Now, Sir, it appears to me, with respect to the propriety of introducing topics of this kind into the Speech, it depends entirely upon the magnitude of the question, upon the interest it commands, upon the absence of any public inconvenience in reference to it, and upon the confidence the Government entertain that they will be able to give effect to their intentions. Upon these grounds, it did appear to us eminently suitable that we should at this moment, when very great interest is felt in the subject throughout the country, do something to satisfy that interest by the announcement of our own clear and unequivocal intention. Then the right hon. Gentleman states that the paragraph in question seemed—as it never was intended to be—in the nature of a disparagement of the working of the new Act for the trial of Election Petitions. The right hon. Gentleman says that we have obtained a fresh guarantee for the “tranquillity, the purity, and the freedom of elections.” Sir, I do not in the least object to the expression of that opinion by the right hon. Gentleman. I think that probably until the whole of the petitions have been tried and disposed of, the time has hardly come for expressing anything like a positive judgment in a speech in this House, and still less in a Speech from the Throne. But I confess my own view and that of my Colleagues is not unfavourable to the working of the Act as far as it goes; and considering the great share the right hon. Gentleman has had in passing the Act through this House, I very sincerely congratulate him on its having become the law of the land, and I trust the more its character is unfolded in the working, the more the favourable view of it may be confirmed. But the working of that Act has, I conceive, reference not to direct guarantees for the “tranquillity, purity, and freedom of elections,” but to indirect guarantees—very important it is true, but still wholly indirect—which are afforded by a good system of punishing breaches of “tranquillity, purity, and freedom of election” whenever they occur. It is not the working of the Act which would be the direct and natural object of inquiry by this Committee. Its working would probably be examined; but the object of the inquiry that we propose relates, not to the punishment but to the prevention of breaches of “tranquillity, purity, and freedom of elections;” and the right hon. Gentleman will see that every thing that occurs, from the first beginning of an election down to the final act of return, is included within the idea, and within the province which, if the House approves the proposal of the Government, will be assigned to this inquiry. The right hon. Gentleman made further comments upon the paragraph in the Speech which refers to education, and stated that he deeply lamented the omission of all reference to the question of national education on a broad and general basis, and that he feared it was to be regarded as postponed sine die. Sir, I will not pretend to quote the authority of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues, who did not mention the subject of national education in the Speech of last year; and yet, although they did not think it so necessary to mention it on that occasion as the right hon. Gentleman now believes it to be, they did introduce a measure on that subject. But two questions arise to my mind in connection with this criticism—the first is, whether real progress in great national questions is achieved by the simple fact that a Government introduces a measure to Parliament without the hope of passing it; and the second question is, what is the purpose of a Queen's Speech? Is it the business of a

Queen's Speech to set out in detail, I will not say all possible measures, I will not even say all great measures, but all urgent measures? I think that is putting the question fairly. Now I believe that the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman does proceed upon an implied proposition, —which I think erroneous,—as broad as that. I think he seems to suppose that every great and urgent measure ought to receive notice in a Speech from the Throne. I humbly differ from that opinion, although the authority of the right hon. Gentleman is a high one. It seems to me that there is no greater temptation to a Government—and against which a new Government especially ought to be on its guard—than that of promising in a Speech from the Throne a great number of measures of vast and widely-extended interest, without any careful reckoning or calculation of the time at their disposal for carrying them into law. Sir, I believe that if this Speech which has been delivered from the Throne, be open to criticism at all, and if the advice of Ministers in the framing of it is to be challenged, it is rather for its containing too much than too little. I may, perhaps, over-estimate the great demands which will be made on our time by one great measure; but when I see that we speak of dealing with the hardships of occupiers as regards Rating, with education in Scotland, with Endowed Schools in England, with the representative principle in controlling the County Rate, and with the subject of Bankruptcy—these are five matters all of them of very great importance—in my opinion we shall be among the most fortunate of administrators should we be able in the course of this Session, with all the aid that the patience, intelligence, and indulgence of the House can give us, to carry those five measures, as well as our one greater measure, to a successful issue. Sir, the motive by which we have been guided in our advice to the Throne as to the enumeration of subjects is a very simple one. We have felt, as we have said, that one question had a paramount claim upon our notice, upon our care, upon our most patient and determined energies, such as they may be—I mean the settlement of the great question of the Irish Church; and I think that, apart from any differences of opinion prevailing in this House, every man will agree that those who take the responsibility of stirring such a controversy as that are bound to allow no secondary object, however important it may seem to them, to interfere with their efforts for bringing it to a satisfactory issue. We had then to ask ourselves what subjects there were which were great, and what subjects there were which were urgent, and which with favourable augury we might hope to introduce into the House of Commons, because we might hope in a very great degree, or almost entirely, to separate them from the discussions or dissensions of party. If we wish for party conflict it may be that, in the one wide field open before us, we shall find enough to satisfy the greatest appetite. At all events, it is our wish not to multiply such subjects; and with reference to one which may be regarded as a subject of party conflict—I mean the question with respect to Rating—I will say that we shall endeavour to treat it in such a way as to remedy a practical grievance without reference to former controversies. The same thing applies to all the other great questions introduced in the Speech; and I hope that the House will approve the principle by which we have been actuated, first of all in endeavouring to afford it abundance of occupation for the employment of its various energies and resources upon questions not likely to lead to strong party differences; and secondly, to keep the field clear, as far as we can, for the great question of the Irish Church. Sir, we are deeply sensible of the pressing and urgent nature of the question of national education; and permit me to say this one word more, that we do not think this Speech without practical indications of our convictions in that respect, because the settlement of popular education in Scotland, though a much easier and somewhat narrower measure than the settlement of the same question in England, is a matter much more material than may be supposed for facilitating the solution of the problem in this country. And the same object will be promoted by the measure to be introduced for the regulation of Endowed Schools. And as I have mentioned this question and deprecated the inference—I think somewhat precipitate—of the right hon. Gentleman, that the question of national education is undervalued simply because it is not mentioned in the Speech, I may cover many other great subjects with the same declaration, and in like manner protest against the application in this case of the ancient proverb, that that which is out of sight is out of mind. There is one subject in particular which, perhaps, beyond all, after what has been named, occupies a very high place in the estimation of Her Majesty's Government as to its importance and necessity—I mean the question of the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland—a subject which it would be totally impossible for us to justify our omission to deal with during the Session, or to mention in the Speech, upon any other ground than that we cannot overcome the physical limitations of time by which we are bound, and that it would not be in the fulfilment of our duty, but a breach of our duty, if we were to hold out to the House expectations of legislation upon matters to which we do not think that a just reckoning of our resources would warrant us in applying our attention. On the Irish Church I will only say that I hail with satisfaction the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman. Our earnest desire is to act in the spirit of that portion of the Speech which expresses the conviction of Her Majesty that this question will be approached and that this work will be prosecuted with a desire to afford a just satisfaction to every legitimate interest; and that there will be upon our part every study, if we can, to satisfy the sympathies, and, if we can, not to provoke the antipathies and animosities by which this question is beset. Our hope is that the Parliament of this country will be disposed to take a just and dispassionate view of the stage at which the question has now arrived, and of the prospect which the future offers, and will be inclined not so much, in some of its sections, to insist upon a rigid adherence to what has been formerly desired, as effectually to co-operate in the prosecution of a purpose which is essential to the welfare and the unity of the Empire. The House, I feel satisfied, will not be wanting on its part in the endeavour thus to deal with a subject of as grave consequence and as great difficulty as has ever been intrusted to its care. And, on our part, great will be our responsibility and severe will be the censure which we shall deserve, should we, either by the substance of our proposals or by the manner in which we endeavour to press them forward, fail to sympathize and correspond with those good and wise dispositions on the part of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to call the attention of the House to a matter connected with their own proceedings. Every one might have remarked when the Clerk read the Reports made by the Judges, with respect to the Election Petitions they had tried, that the substance of those Reports was brought before the House in a manner in which it was impossible for the House to deal with it, and he (Mr. Newdegate) could not help feeling that this was scarcely prudent or becoming on the part of the House, for this was the first occasion on which they had received Reports from the Courts of Law, after those Courts had been intrusted with the conduct of inquiries and of business deeply affecting the composition and the very existence of the House itself. He was strongly of opinion that some alteration of their method of receiving these Reports ought to be adopted, for the manner in which they were now received was simply trifling with a responsibility which the House had for centuries refused to delegate, but jealously retained in its own hands. This was not the only respect in which he felt uneasiness as to the future of the House. Hitherto the House of Commons had been the first representative Assembly in the world—the most independent representative and deliberative body intrusted with legislative powers the world had ever known. Now, he feared that the present composition and organization of what were called parties in this House threatened the independent deliberative powers of the House; that there would be a great loss of independent action and exertion on the part of hon. Members generally, and that in these two respects, the one touching the independence of its composition, and the other the independence of its deliberation and of its action, the House should take thought for its own sake and that of the country. He was not about to follow the two right hon. Gentlemen (Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone) in their criticisms upon the composition of the Speech from the Throne. In literary composition and in that of Royal Speeches they were arcades ambo, nor should he touch upon more than two points—one an omission, and the other an evasion, which characterized the Speech and the treatment of it by those who had preceded him, except the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White), who had most properly drawn attention to the omission of all notice of what had occurred in Spain. The Spanish people, following the example of the Neapolitan people, had delivered themselves from the oppressions and disgrace of a Government which was the blind instrument of an Ultramontane priesthood. He (Mr. Newdegate) rejoiced that the Spanish people, though Catholic, had manifested their determination to be free; to enter, as a nation, the ranks of freedom; to gain for themselves the enjoyment of those privileges of freedom and independence as a nation which England had spent millions of money and tens of thousands of the lives of her sons to secure for her. It was a grand effort, and proved that the vitality of Catholic Christianity, with the capacity for freedom which, when pure, that religion confers, still breathes in Spain. But, was it not strange—and he (Mr. Newdegate) was not surprised that the hon. Member for Brighton felt it—that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Gladstone), who had been one of the chief movers for the liberation of Naples, a Member of the Government who introduced a Notice congratulating the Neapolitans upon their emancipation from Ultramontane tyranny into the Speech from the Throne in 1861, should now not admit one cheering word of congratulation and encouragement for the Spanish people into the Royal Speech, of which he must have been the chief composer? From what had the Spanish people delivered themselves? From the agents of the temporal power of the Papacy. What had the Church of Rome lost in Spain? Temporal power. And what was the object of the Papacy everywhere? Temporal power. The Papal hierarchy could not bear the existence of such an exemplar of toleration in religion, of such a source of freedom in Ireland as a Protestant Church, which was devoted to the dissemination of a pure religion, not to the acquisition of temporal power. The contrast was painful to the Ultramontane hierarchy, and it was to gratify them that the Protestant Establishment was sought to be destroyed. This policy was the reverse of that upon which the Spanish nation had entered. On its removal, the obstacle which the Protestant Church presents would be done away with, and the Papal Church would soon be dominant in Ireland. The temporal power of the Pope would gain more representatives from Irish constituencies; the representative force of the temporal power in Ireland must increase, and if the legislative union between England and Ireland was maintained, that temporal power would obtain an increased hold upon that House of Commons, and through the House of Commons over England. It was not surprising that the Prime Minister, who advocated such a policy for the United Kingdom, should omit all notice of what had occurred in Spain from the Royal Speech.

MR. W. R. ORMSBY GORE, as an Irish Member, could not but express his disappointment at no allusion being made in the Queen's Speech to the reform of the Railway system in Ireland. That subject was one not only of urgent but of paramount importance to that country, and he still clung to the hope that the Government had some intention of bringing in a measure relating to it. He would therefore take the liberty of asking them whether they proposed to reform the present state of the railways of Ireland?

MR. CORRANCE said, he did not rise to offer any extended observations upon the policy contained in the Address, in which there was, no doubt, much which might excite the curiosity, and even, possibly, the opposition of hon. Gentlemen on his (the Opposition) side of the House. It was at all times a more grateful task to advert to matters upon which both sides could agree. Prominent in the list of good things which were promised by the Government was financial reform. He could not conceive that it would be for the interest or consistent with the policy which he had always advocated, to throw the least impediment in such a path. No doubt the obstacles in it would be numerous enough; and he confessed that he felt the other day a little apprehension lest the grave matter of the mending of the pens for the Civil Service might not, after all, form an obstacle of a formidable class. Her Majesty's Government were the guardians not only of the public purse, but of the public honour; and in pledging themselves to financial reform, he hoped they had duly considered the nature of the task they had undertaken. He was sorry to be obliged to add the expression of his regret that one or two subjects were not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne in which the public took a deep interest. The questions to which he alluded were those relating to pauperism and local taxation, as well as the prevention of the cattle plague, which was a matter of the greatest importance to the agricultural classes. These were subjects which, if properly dealt with, produced no political results. The adjustment of the incidence of local taxation the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had himself admitted to be of the gravest moment, and it was not too much to have expected that it would have found some recognition in Her Majesty's Speech. There certainly was some reference to the better management of the county rates; but that was a different question. Then, again, there was no allusion to the cattle plague. That subject had been inquired into by a Parliamentary Committee, and the question turned on the matter of finance. Extraordinary concessions had been made to Manchester, Salford, and Liverpool, at the instance of two right hon. Gentlemen, and the loss of the Bill was the result. But, as an instance of the speedy repentance of those localities, or of the ingratitude of mankind, those two right hon. Gentlemen lost their seats. He was desirous of referring to those points on that occasion with a view of conveying as much as anything else a warning to the Government with regard to the future; for it must, he thought, be acknowledged that the agricultural community, consisting of landlords, tenants, and labourers, had not had its due share of that enlightened legislation by which the commercial classes had of late years so largely benefited. If such should continue to be the case the result would be that their representatives would take their place in that House as an interest apart, in order that they might the better be able to fight their battles, while the action of the Chambers of Agriculture would, he had no doubt, be found to exercise a potent influence on Parliament. The Government did not seem to him to be sufficiently alive to the importance of those considerations, and he trusted their attention would be more closely directed to subjects with which the interests of the agricultural classes were so intimately associated.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply to the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. W. R. Ormsby Gore), said, that if he would repeat the question which he had put to him with respect to Irish railways next week, he would be prepared to answer it.

MR. MACFIE expressed his satisfaction at finding that the subject of education in Scotland found a place in the Royal Speech. He believed that the measure would have an entirely unsectarian and undenominational character.

MR. M'MAHON regretted that no mention was made in the Speech of a measure of Reform relating to Ireland, and hoped that steps would be taken to remedy the inequality at present existing between the county and borough representation in that country. In England, at present, the proportion was about two borough Members to each county Member, and he wished to see the same state of things exist in Ireland, instead of their being two county Members to one borough Member.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he could well understand that the magnitude of the Irish question was some justification for not mentioning matters of comparatively trivial importance; but he was of opinion that the policy of conciliation which the Government had resolved to carry out towards Ireland would be incomplete if they refused to yield to the strong feeling which existed in that country as to the expediency of allowing bygones to be bygones, and granting, as far as possible, a general political amnesty.

MR. HADFIELD said, he was glad to hear that Her Majesty's Ministers were about to take steps which he hoped would ensure the loyalty of Ireland, and he would give them his best support. But surely disloyalty was not the highest recommendation to justice. Those whose fidelity to the Reigning Family had never been impeached ought to have their claims to equality considered. Was the Annuity Tax to be retained in Scotland while the Irish Church was disendowed and the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum were discontinued? Why was not justice done to English Dissenters in the matter of burial grounds? One subject would require the attention of Parliament not only in the interests of one part of the United Kingdom, but of all. He hoped that when the Irish prelates were removed from the Upper House the English prelates would be removed also. They represented only a minority of the people of the United Kingdom. They had supported church rates as long as they could; they had opposed his humble efforts to do justice to Dissenters by abolishing tests and disabilities, and Churchmen themselves were of opinion that great benefit would result to morality and religion in this country by the removal of the Bishops from Parliament. It would be a glorious day for this country when the Bishops were no longer in a situation to dishonour their Christian profession by urging perpetual war on all occasions against political justice and equality to all classes in the country. The reform contemplated in the Irish Church would not stop there. The opinion of the country would be that the House of Lords should be relieved of the presence of men who were not hereditary Peers, but simple life tenants, and who were often aged tutors and schoolmasters.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts.
Ordered—First Reading—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts [1]; Admiralty Jurisdiction (County Courts).

ENGLISH FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. DODDS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copy of a Judgment of the Special Commissioners for English Fisheries, delivered on the 10th day of December last at Workington, in the case of Lord Lonsdale's fishing coop in the river Derwent relating to the law of weirs in the non-navigable portions of salmon rivers in England?

MR. BRUCE said, he had no objection to lay upon the table a copy of the judgment of the Special Commissioners of English Fisheries, delivered on the 10th of December last at Workington, in the case of Lord Lonsdale's fishing coop in the Derwent.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend and perpetuate the Acts relating to Contagious or Infectious Diseases among Cattle and other animals, and for other purposes, said, he understood there would be no opposition offered to the introduction of the Bill, and he would not therefore take up the time of the House by arguing in its favour. When the subject was under discussion last year the present Prime Minister made a suggestion, which seemed to be fraught with wisdom—namely, that any Bill intended to deal with London should also deal with the kingdom generally. He (Lord Robert Montagu) had acted upon that suggestion, and the present Bill was not one of a local or hybrid character, but was a general Bill, the provisions of which were applicable for England and Scotland. Its first provision was to render permanent those Acts upon which the present system rested, and which had been continued from time to time. These Acts would only last for two Sessions longer unless they were made permanent. Under those Acts the Privy Council might appoint certain ports where foreign cattle might be landed; and at those ports certain portions of ground had to be set apart for separate markets; these markets were for the reception of all foreign cattle, which had to be slaughtered before removal. On the other hand, the local authorities, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts, had powers for acquiring land for these separate markets. There were three modes by which they might provide for the expenses: first, out of the ordinary county or borough rates; secondly, by means of tolls or rates on the markets; and thirdly, by borrowing from the Public Works Loan Commissioners at the rate of $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Under those Acts there was, however, no direct obligation laid on the local authorities for the formation of these separate markets. It was, in fact, optional with a town to cease to import cattle, and not set apart any portion of ground for a separate market. But under the present Bill it would be made obligatory on every local authority proposing to import cattle to set apart permanently such a place for a market. The provisions of the Bill were made permanent, partly because the inconvenience and loss was great, when a large sum of money had to be expended for an ephemeral object, which could not long continue to pay interest on capital. The local authority, according to the existing law, would continue to be, in counties, the Quarter Sessions, and in boroughs the municipal authorities. As regarded the metropolis the City Corporation would be the local authority in the City, but in the metropolitan area the local authority would be the Metropolitan Board of Works. In the Bill, however, the local authority would only be designated by the term "local authority." He did not propose to interfere with the jurisdiction of the local authorities as now existing. The local authority, if they chose, might have two or three or more places, instead of one, for the reception and slaughter of foreign cattle. In Essex, for instance, the Thames Haven and Dagenham Dock Companies might both apply to the local authorities and be sanctioned, or a company might be formed and apply for the sanction of a new locality. The Bill would have very little effect upon the country generally, because at those provincial ports where foreign cattle were now permitted to be landed accommodation had already been provided. Under the previous Acts the local authorities were placed at a great disadvantage in raising money, because the markets to be provided were not permanent; this Bill would relieve them of that disadvantage. Of all places in the kingdom London would be the most affected by the Bill, which, however, would contain advantageous powers for enabling the Corporation to mortgage the funds at their disposal for the market, besides other advantages. The Bill would reserve to the Privy Council their existing powers to permit certain classes of cattle to be imported into the English markets. Last year an application was made to the Privy Council for permission to import cattle from Normandy, Brittany, Spain, and Portugal into our southern ports, and the Bill would not take away from the Privy Council the power of dealing with such applications, but they would of course do so upon their own responsibility. The Privy Council would also retain their present powers of quarantine. They would also be given a power to extend the time for the formation of the markets in large towns from one to three years. The local authorities, on the other hand, would have powers for acquiring land just as they did now under the Local Government Act.

MR. SELWIN-IBBETSON, in seconding the Motion, said, he believed the proposed measure would be very beneficial. Perhaps the Government might entertain a suggestion he would offer for the redress of a grievance. During the prevalence of the cattle plague in this country an Act was passed providing compensation at a fixed sum, to be paid to those owners of cattle whose beasts had been slaughtered under the orders of the inspectors; and another Act was afterwards passed, providing that compensation should be paid out of the rates. But in the interval between the passing of those two Acts many beasts were slaughtered by order of the inspectors, the owners of which had been unable to obtain any compensation because the compulsory slaughter happened in that interval. The Government might perhaps consider whether a clause should not be introduced into the Bill to meet these claims.

MR. HEADLAM said, he would not oppose the introduction of the Bill, but, judging it from the description which the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) had given of it, it would be his duty to oppose the Bill on the second reading, and at every subsequent stage. He was not sorry the noble Lord had brought it forward so early, because it was abso-lately necessary that the principles on which the importation of foreign cattle was to be regulated should be made clear and plain. He had already presented a Petition on the subject from the town he represented, and he could state that a healthy and vigorous trade in foreign cattle, which was for the benefit of the whole community, and which would have grown every year, had been reduced by the establishment of these separate markets, which had brought it down to one-third of what it was before they were opened. The question was fully discussed at the end of last Session, and the result was that the Bill for the establishment of a separate market for London was withdrawn. After its withdrawal the Privy Council issued an Order placing the importation of sheep under the same regulations as that of cattle with regard to the separate markets, and the result had been that the importation of foreign sheep into Newcastle had been put a stop to, and the trade completely destroyed. This was a grave and serious subject, affecting the welfare of the whole community, and as such it would have to be considered by the House. So far as he could form an opinion of the Bill of the noble Lord, its object was to stereotype a most objectionable system to make it absolute and permanent.

Mr. DENT said, he would have preferred to see the Bill in the hands of the Government, rather than in the hands of a private Member, although he had no doubt that the noble Lord who had introduced the measure was better acquainted with the subject than most Members of the House. From the speech of the noble Lord it was not to be gathered that he intended dealing in any way with the diseases of home cattle and the regulations to be imposed upon them; and yet, taking a series of years, the losses to the farmer and consumer from the lung disease and the foot and mouth disease in the home breeds had been quite as large as from the cattle plague. No Bill could be satisfactory to the country which, while it attempted to impose restrictions on foreign cattle, did not deal with the diseases of English cattle; it would not be fair to the consumer, to the importer, nor to the farmer himself. He had entertained great hopes that the Government would have taken up the subject, and he should be very glad to know that it was to be dealt with as a whole.

Mr. BRUCE, without offering any opinion on the Bill sketched by the noble Lord, would simply say that the Government would not offer any opposition to its introduction. With respect to the Order in Council in reference to the importation of sheep, made early in the Recess, he was glad to state that the Government were considering whether it might not be rescinded.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the Bill of last year was generally approved, but it failed because of its financial defect. It was absolutely necessary that some restrictions of a permanent character should be placed on the importation of foreign cattle from the eastern countries. The question of the markets had been made a great deal of, but he did not believe that the markets would be very expensive; and he was certain that when the Bill came to be discussed the feeling of the House would be strongly in its favour.

Motion agreed to.

NEW PEER.

The Earl of Caithness in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Scotland, having been created Baron Barrogill of the United Kingdom—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

BANKRUPTCY BILL—PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he desired to put a Question to the noble Earl, the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The noble Earl assured their Lordships the other evening that the House would not be without work at the commencement of the Session? Now, he (Lord Chelmsford) wished to ask the noble Earl, Whether it was a fact that the Bankruptcy Bill was to be introduced into the House of Commons? He thought that if there was any subject that more specially belonged to the consideration of their Lordships than another, it was the Bankruptcy Bill. Their Lordships were aware that Session after Session Bills on that subject had been introduced in their Lordships' House; and a Committee of their Lordships had sat to consider the subject. Several of his noble and learned Friends had not only taken part in the discussions on Bills of that description, but they had themselves been the originators of Bills, or had assisted in perfecting clauses in Bills dealing with the subject; and he was quite sure that the subject would have a much more satisfactory discussion if the initiative were taken in that House than it would receive if first introduced in the House of Commons; for, in all probability, their Lordships would not then hear anything of the Bill till the month of July. He wished to ask his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, Whether it was true that it was the intention of the Government to introduce the Bankruptcy Bill into the House of Commons?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It is only within the last few minutes that I received an intimation from my noble and learned Friend that he was about to put this Question to me; but as the matter has been very much considered, I have no difficulty in giving an Answer. It is quite true that Notice has been given of the introduction of a Bankruptcy Bill into the House of Commons, and it will, I believe, be introduced in that House. It is also quite true, as my noble and learned Friend has said, that the question has been considered and re-considered in its various stages at various times. Indeed, I have had three very complicated, but, at the same time, very well arranged, and, in many respects, good Bills on the subject, presented to me for attention. Although there are reasons which have prevented my accepting entirely any of these measures, I have felt bound fully to consider those Bills, the matters treated in which affect so much the interests of a large and important portion of the community. I have also had communications on the subject from various members of Chambers of Commerce, and other persons connected with the trading and mercantile community, as well as from persons acting professionally for such parties, some of them representing towns such as Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham, which take a special interest in the matter. I have had, besides, personal communication, and communication by letter with various persons engaged in the commerce of the country; and I have found that though these persons differ in some respects, there seemed to be among them a common desire that a Bill affecting so materially trade and commerce, should be introduced into the House of Commons. Feeling that there was some degree of reason in this wish, I decided to introduce the Bill into the other House first. I thought the best mode would be, under the circumstances, to have the Bill introduced at as early a period as possible in the other House, in order that your Lordships may be afforded an opportunity of fully discussing and considering the subject. This is the Answer I have to give to the noble and learned Lord.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not think their Lordships would have any reason to complain if the Government did not give them any work, either at the beginning or the end of the Session; but he thought they would have great reason to complain if, after an enforced idleness up to Easter there should be a crush of work towards the end of the summer, which made it absolutely impossible for their Lordships to discharge their legislative functions satisfactorily, or give to the various matters brought before them the attention they deserved. It was a matter of notoriety that for many years this had been the case with the House of Lords:—for months nothing was done in their Lordships' House, but towards the end of June or the beginning of July, just at the time when everybody's strength was exhausted, and the weather was not particularly favourable for laborious investigation, there came up a flood of Bills from the House of Commons, to which it was wholly beyond the physical power of any legislative assembly to give adequate consideration. It seemed to him that that was a state of things which their Lordships ought to take very stringent measures to redress. He hoped the Government would co-operate with them—he should rather say would take the initiative in redressing it, and would do their best to ensure that those measures which they desired that House to consider should be introduced at a sufficiently early period to enable that consideration to be real. He should be very sorry to be thought factious in that House, but he begged to give notice that with regard to Bills brought up at a time when it was not physically possible to give them adequate consideration, be the merits of these Bills what they might, he should interpose every obstacle which the forms of the House allowed to prevent these Bills passing into a law. It was a farce to maintain a legislative body, and then to expect it to perform legislative duties just at the lag-end of the Session. There were some persons in the community who believed that their Lordships' House might be properly abolished; there were others who believed that its constitution might be properly altered; but he ventured to say there was no person in the community who believed it was desirable that the legislative functions of that House should remain a perfect sham, and that their Lordships should be required to register as mere matters of form subjects which had been really considered only in the other House of Parliament. He did earnestly press this question upon the attention of the noble Earl who led the Government in that House (Earl Granville). There was no one in that House who had a more anxious desire than the noble Earl had to maintain the position of the House of Lords, and there was no way in which the noble Earl could give more full effect to that desire than by providing a remedy for this great and pressing evil. He need not say it was not a matter which could be made a reproach against any Government or of any party. It was an evil which had lasted many years. To the great Administration of Sir Robert Peel the complaints dated back; but it was an evil that had now grown to such a height that, unless something were done to redress it, the position and character of their Lordships' House in the community, as a instrument of legislative action, would be irrevocably gone.

EARL GRANVILLE thanked the noble Marquess for the courteous terms in which he had spoken of himself, and assured him that he entirely concurred in all he had said as to the deficiency of early business for this House, and the great accumulation of work towards the end of the Session. He was most anxious to equalize the work which came before their Lordships. The evil was not one of recent growth—it had been a subject of complaint for years; and he remembered hearing Lord Aberdeen state, some fourteen or fifteen years ago, that during the fifty years over which his memory extended the same complaint had annually been made. He (Earl Granville) had endeavoured, and as he had hoped with some success, to bring before their Lordships measures of importance at an early period of the Session; but with regard to two Bills on which he had counted, Notice was given, rather to his surprise, the very first day of the Session, of their introduction into the House of Commons. He assured their Lordships that he would not fail to urge upon his Colleagues the claim which they had a right to make, that business should be provided for them at a time when they had abundant opportunity of transacting it.

EARL GREY said, he believed the extent of the evil now complained of to be greatly due to their Lordships themselves, and perhaps to no one so much as to his noble friend (Earl Granville), who had just addressed the House. Allow him to remind their Lordships of what had taken place a few years ago. Some years since all were agreed that steps should be taken to check the same evil which is now complained of. With this view the House came to a formal Resolution that they would refuse to consider, with a view to legislation in the current Session, any Bill which came up after a certain date, unless it related to Supply, or was of immediate and pressing urgency. That Resolution was adopted with the unanimous assent of the House, his noble Friend (the Chairman of Committees) pointing out, in moving it, that it would do more harm than good unless their Lordships were prepared seriously to enforce it. What, however, happened? Towards the close of the Session, in the month of July, a Bill came up from the other House establishing the principle, as it was called, of Limited Liability. That was a subject of extreme difficulty, requiring the fullest consideration, and it was not at all one of such pressing urgency that it should have been passed without due consideration by their Lordships. To the astonishment, however, of most noble Lords, his noble Friend (Earl Granville), who then occupied the same position that he now filled, gave Notice of a Motion, affirming it to be so pressing, that the Resolution against proceeding with Bills which came up too late for proper consideration should be waived for it and the Bill proceeded with. The noble Chairman of Committees had so strong a feeling in the matter, that he at once announced his determination to oppose the Motion, and he himself (Earl Grey) thought it of so much importance that, though he had left London for the season, and was about 300 miles distant, he thought it his duty to come up to town and support him. At that late period of the summer, however, the attendance of noble Lords unconnected with the Government was small, and their opposition was fruitless. Lord Overstone had a strong objection to the measure, which was discussed for a whole night in Committee, but it was hardly argued, for to all the objections urged by him, by myself, and one or two others, scarcely any answer was vouchsafed on the other side, but they were summarily over-ruled by divisions, in which all our Amendments were defeated by majorities of 30 or 40 to 4 or 5. The result, however, had shown that he and his noble Friend were not very far wrong in regarding this as a hasty and improper mode of legislation. He appealed to noble and learned Lords who possessed judicial experience whether it had not been proved by its working to have been about the most hasty and inconsiderate piece of legislation which ever passed the two Houses, and whether it had not notoriously been the cause of infinite suffering and losses to numerous private families throughout the kingdom, while it had also, he feared, tended very seriously to degrade and lower the whole tone of commercial morality in this country. His noble Friend Lord Redesdale) declared distinctly that he would not again, in another Session, move a Resolution against proceeding with Bills, not of pressing necessity, which reached that House too late in the Session, if this were set aside in favour of a Bill such as that which he had described, to which it ought to have been considered as specially applicable, since it was a measure for making a great and permanent change in our commercial legislation, which, even if it were right, could not be said to be one in the passing of which a year's delay would have been of the slightest importance, while it obviously required the utmost care in examining its details. The consequence had been that for the last thirteen or fourteen years no such Resolution had been proposed. He (Earl Grey) agreed with his noble Friend that it would have been a farce, after his experience of the want of firmness on the part of the House, to submit a similar Resolution, and he only trusted that if the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) endeavoured to carry into effect the views he had so justly expressed, he would find the House a little more firm and consistent than on former occasions.

LORD CAIRNS said, recurring to the measure which had been the original cause of this discussion, that he hoped that, nothing having at present been done, the Government would even yet reconsider the course they would adopt with reference to the Bankruptcy Bill. He did not think the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, or any other member of the Government, would express an opinion that there was any reasonable probability of the measure—considering its length and the many interesting questions it would raise—passing through the House of Commons before the end of June or the beginning of July. If he remembered right the number of clauses in the Bill of last year was between 200 and 300, almost every one of which was of importance; and at the beginning of July their Lordships would have other measures of great consequence coming up from the House of Commons, and requiring their undivided attention. How, then, could the Bankruptcy Bill, jostled by other important measures, receive the consideration it required? If, on the other hand, it was now introduced, their Lordships were not occupied with any other business, and it might reach the House of Commons at a time when they in turn would be better able than at present to deal with it. He had been struck by what his noble and learned Friend had told them had happened within the last few weeks, and it appeared to him that that statement afforded the best recommendation that the Bill should originate in their Lordships' House. His noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) had stated that he had received deputations from the mercantile community in various parts of the country who were anxious to express their views on the subject. Now he had had some experience of that process, and he knew how valuable and important it was for the purposes of legislation. While, however, the noble and learned Lord, as a high Officer of the Government, had seen deputations, and knew the minds of the mercantile community on the subject, the Bill would devolve on the other House on one of the Law Officers of the Crown, whose time was fully occupied with other business, who was not a member of the Cabinet, and who, therefore, could not address deputations with the authority and weight of the noble and learned Lord; whereas, if the measure was introduced in this House the noble and learned Lord would be a medium of communication between their Lordships and the mercantile community, since he would come here fresh from hearing the opinions of the trading community. He thought that if the representatives of the mercantile community were aware of the peril the Bill would run of not passing at all if brought first into the other House, they would alter their opinion. He could not help thinking that this preference for the House of Commons was the more to be wondered at when they remembered that a Committee of their Lordships' House had sat on the whole question, and that the measure to be introduced was nothing more than an affirmation of the propositions to which that Committee had given their assent.

EARL RUSSELL said, it was of great importance that they should arrive at a clear understanding how it was that measures came up so late to their Lordships' House. It was obvious that many Bills were first brought forward in the House of Commons, and were there passed by decided majorities, which it was not likely would ever have been originated in their Lordships' House, but to which their Lordships would naturally, from that circumstance, pay far greater regard. Measures also affecting taxation necessarily came first before the other House. There were, however, questions of a legal or ecclesiastical character, and questions affecting our relations with foreign countries, which, owing to the presence of noble and learned Lords who had occupied the Woolsack, of Prelates of the Church, and of noble Lords who had held the Seals of the Foreign Office, might advantageously be debated in this House. With regard to important Bills coming up in July, he recollected that measures of the highest importance, such as the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, the Repeal of the Corn Laws, and some others, came before their Lordships in April or May, allowing ample time for discussion. With regard to the future conduct of business, he would venture to throw out a suggestion. At one period the Estimates were voted up to the 1st of January; but this was afterwards changed to the 31st of March. Now that alteration had necessitated the consideration of the Estimates, which often led to long discussions, but of course did not result in any measures being sent up to their Lordships, between the meeting of Parliament, which was generally early in February, and the 31st of March. He would suggest to the Government the propriety of extending the Estimates to the 30th of June, by which means the House of Commons would have all the time up to the end of April for discussing measures intended to be sent up to their Lordships. It was, he thought, desirable that measures of great importance should have the assent of the House of Commons previous to their being discussed by their Lordships. The enlargement of the constituencies might, perhaps, result in an increase of talk in the House of Commons, and, unless there was an alteration in the financial arrangements, measures would not come up, as they did formerly, at the beginning of May, but as late as the middle or end of July. He did not think that any inconvenience would result from such an alteration, whilst it would facilitate the discussion of other matters of importance in both Houses of Parliament.

LORD WESTBURY said, he would earnestly recommend the Government to confine the Bankruptcy Bill to the two points mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech—the more effective distribution of assets and the abolition of imprisonment for debt. If they attempted to introduce what he would term a "monster" Bill, it would stand a great chance of not receiving sufficient consideration, and this important subject would have to be postponed to another Session. He quite concurred in the opinion that the measure should first receive the consideration of their Lordships, and a Select Committee might receive the suggestions of the mercantile bodies. He foresaw so much difficulty in the way of a Consolidation Bill first introduced into the other House that, though from bitter experience he had little confidence in this House at large in dealing with bankruptcy, he should himself bring in a Bill, limited to the two crying evils he had mentioned, in order that it might be fully considered before they could hope to receive a lengthy Bill from the House of Commons. With regard to the general complaint that had been made, he thought it was much to be regretted that almost all important measures were first carried through the House of Commons.

EARL GRANVILLE reminded their Lordships that one of the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session was that Questions which would lead to discussion should not be put without Notice. The Question of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) was one perfectly legitimate, but the House had been led from it into a debate which, though important and interesting, would have been still more so had Notice of it been given. He hoped, therefore, the rule would in future be adhered to.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.
THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

EARL GRANVILLE: I beg to move that the Address adopted by this House, in reply to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, be presented by the Whole House. In making that Motion, I may state that the Queen felt great regret at being prevented from opening her New Parliament in Person. If, however, Her Majesty had done so, it would have been against the express opinion of Her medical advisers. No Parliament during Her Majesty's reign has been chosen by so large and free an expression of the will of Her loyal People as the present. Your Lordships' will therefore easily understand and appreciate the desire of Her Majesty under these circumstances to meet your Lordships and the representatives of the People forming the other branch of the Legislature. I am authorized to say that it is Her Majesty's gracious intention to come to town for this especial purpose, if the Motion which I have made, and which has already been unanimously agreed to by the House of Commons, is adopted, as I have no doubt it will be, by your Lordships.

LORD CAIRNS: I am sure your Lordships will have heard with pleasure the communication which has been made by the noble Earl, both because the Motion which he has made will afford your Lordships an opportunity of personally laying at the foot of the Throne the loyal Address to which you have agreed, and also because the communication furnishes fresh proof, if proof were needed, of the anxious solicitude entertained by Her Majesty to perform Her high public functions in a manner most gracious and gratifying to Her loyal subjects.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Address to Her Majesty agreed to on Tuesday last be presented to Her Majesty by the Whole House: Ordered, That the Lords with White Staves do wait upon Her Majesty to know at what time Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to appoint to be attended with the said Address.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock 'till To-morrow a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 18th February, 1869.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—New Radnor, v. Richard Green Price, esq., Chiltern Hundreds.

SELECT COMMITTEE — Printing, appointed and nominated.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. DODSON rose to ask the House to agree to certain Resolutions of which he had given Notice. They had simply for their object to supplement, facilitate, and carry out the 35th section of the Railway Regulations Act of last Session, which provided that, in cases where Bills were promoted by Railway Companies, a meeting of the shareholders, under certain conditions, should be held between the first and second reading of the Bills; and that they should not be read a second time unless the House was satisfied the meetings were held in due form according to the Act. What he now proposed was that the Examiners of Private Bills should ascertain and inform the House whether the meeting of the shareholders had been held. In order to give time for the meeting of the shareholders to be held, and for the Examiners to inquire and make their Report, it would be necessary, in the case of a Bill coming under the operation of the Act, to extend the time allowed by the Standing Orders between the first and second reading of the Bill from seven to fourteen days. He proposed to supplement these Resolutions by another to the effect that, in cases where a poll at a meeting had been taken, the requisite documents should be deposited in the Private Bill Office. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolutions.

MR. HADFELD complained that the Standing Orders of the House of Commons did not permit of a shareholder being heard before a Committee, while in the Lords shareholders were permitted to appear. He knew one case in which shareholders, by availing themselves of the Lords' practice, prevented the issue of £1,800,000 in pre-preference shares. He thought the practice of the two Houses ought to be assimilated.

MR. DODSON said, that the point referred to by the hon. Gentleman was not a new one; still it might be worthy of consideration at a proper time; but as the Resolutions now before the House applied to the practice of Examiners and not to that of Committees, it would be out of order to discuss it at present.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That every Railway Bill promoted by an Incorporated Company and originating in this House shall, after having been read a first time, be referred to the Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills, who shall inquire and report as to compliance with the provisions of the Act 31 and 32 Vic. c. 119, s. 35.

Ordered, That the Examiner shall give at least two clear days' notice in the Private Bill Office of the day appointed for such examination, and Standing Orders 76, 77, and 220, shall be applicable to any Memorials complaining of non-compliance with such Provisions.

Ordered, That in the case of such Bills the time limited by Standing Order 191 between the first and second reading shall be extended to, but shall in no case exceed, fourteen days.

Ordered, That the Statement required by the fifth provision of the said 35th section to be laid before Parliament, in case of a poll being taken, shall be deposited in the Private Bill Office.—(Mr. Dodson.)

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Report of Address brought up, and read.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I rise for the purpose of proposing a Motion, which I hope and feel convinced will not be unacceptable to the House. It is that the Address to which we have just agreed be presented to Her Majesty by the Whole House. It was a matter of serious concern to Her Majesty that she was precluded from meeting the two Houses—and particularly the House of Commons, chosen under circumstances of such peculiar and special interest—by the ancient method of opening the Session of Parliament in State. But Her Majesty had been suffering more than usual from severe headache, and to a degree which precluded her from making the necessary exertion at the period when the opening of Parliament occurred in the present year. There is another circumstance I will add, and which I think it is desirable the House should be made aware of. It is that at all periods of the life of Her Majesty—at the periods both of its unclouded happiness and her unimpaired strength—this particular effort, with the lengthened ceremony it entailed, did always tax the powers of Her Majesty to the very utmost, although it is a ceremonial which she was and is always desirous to perform at the times when she can venture to undertake it. But there is another mode by which a great portion of the desire of Her Majesty may be attained—that is to say, that she may have the satisfaction of meeting Parliament and of meeting the House of Commons by receiving the Addresses of Parliament in person, should the House enter into her views. My belief is that the House will receive this intimation as another gratifying proof, if indeed proof were wanted, of Her Majesty's great sympathy with Her People in all matters that concern their interests, and especially upon an occasion when a great and important measure for reforming the representation of the people and so largely extending the franchise has, for the first time, come into operation. I am, therefore, to state that Her Majesty will be pleased to come to London for the purpose of receiving the Addresses of both Houses of Parliament, in case the Motion I am about to make that the Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Whole House, shall be agreed to both in this and in the other House of Parliament. It is right that in making this Motion I should advert to the course that has been adopted in presenting former Addresses. It has been the practice when the Speech has been delivered by Royal Commission that the Address in reply has not been usually received by Her Majesty in person; but there was an occasion in the reign of George III., when it happened that the Sovereign was prevented by a domestic sorrow in the death of the Duke of Gloucester, and by his failing health, from coming to Parliament for the purpose of solemnly and formally opening the Session, and when, at the same time, it happened there was a public and national occasion of satisfaction, which the House desired to testify at the foot of the Throne by presenting the Address in person. The analogy between that occasion and the present appears to me to be complete, so far as the substance is concerned. The difference is, that at that period the occasion of joy and pleasure was the gaining of a victory by the arms of England at the Battle of Trafalgar—the occasion now is the celebration of a great and peaceful triumph in the passing of a measure which very largely extends the liberty of the people. As on that occasion the two Houses attended the Sovereign with their Addresses and with their congratulations, so it appears to me that now—especially when Her Majesty has been pleased in Her gracious Speech from the Throne to mark her peculiar satisfaction in the passing of this Act as an occasion of joy and advantage to the public—the House, on its part, will be glad to answer, not with mere words, that expression of satisfaction, but by an act which it will be in their power to perform, by proceeding, headed by you, Sir, and with the attendance of such Members as may choose to constitute a House or may be able to attend, to the Palace, to which Her Majesty will readily come, at a suitable period, from Windsor, for the purpose of receiving the loyal and dutiful Address of Parliament. One word more. I ought to say that no doubt it will be a matter for the consideration of the authorities of the House whether, as the practice has been to attend the Sovereign in person only upon occasions when there was a special cause for the Speech being delivered by Commission, it will be proper or necessary to mark the occasion by some suitable entry in the Journals. That, however, is for the consideration of the authorities, and it is not a matter for me to decide. In these few words I have to move “That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Whole House.”

MR. DISRAELI: I should be willing that a Motion of this kind should pass without notice, but as the course proposed is an unusual one for the House to adopt, it is better that it should be adopted in a manner which should not lead in the future to misconception and mistake. I am sure the House most sincerely regrets that the state of Her Majesty's health deprived Her Majesty of the gratification she would have felt in meeting the New Parliament, in the peculiar circumstances under which we were chosen. Although I acknowledge that we ought to assent to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, being an unusual one, with some caution, I hold it so important and so desirable that some personal relations should be established between Her Majesty and the New Parliament that has been elected, that I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is a wise and judicious one. We shall take a course gratifying to Her Majesty and gratifying to this House, while at the same time it will be adopted, I doubt not, with those precautions which the right hon. Gentleman has hinted at, so that for the future it will be referred to as a course adopted by the House under peculiar circumstances, and not as a ceremonial which is to be followed by the House as the ordinary course, when the peculiar and interesting circumstances which have induced Her Majesty graciously to give us this intimation do not exist.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK expressed his regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had not given notice of the Motion, so that the House might have had an opportunity of considering its terms. He should not, however, have risen if it had not been for an observation that fell from the right hon. Gentleman, to the effect that on a former occasion, when a similar course was pursued, it was for the purpose of offering the congratulations of the House on a great victory having been achieved by the British arms, while the House was at present asked to congratulate Her Majesty on a great political triumph. His object in then addressing the House was to protest against any course being adopted upon the present occasion which would give any colour to the conclusion that the House congratulated the Queen or the country on any political triumph that might or might not have been obtained. That was a question which would be brought under the consideration of the House before long, and it would then be time enough to congratulate the Ministry, or the Crown, or the country on the results of the recent change in our electoral system.

Address agreed to:—

To be presented by the Whole House :—Privy Councillors humbly to know Her Majesty's pleasure when She will be attended.

SCOTLAND—PORTPATRICK HARBOUR AND LIGHTHOUSE.—QUESTION.

LORD GARLIES said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is intended to discontinue the light in Portpatrick Lighthouse; and, if such change be intended, to state the reasons for its discontinuance?

MR. BRIGHT: The noble Lord, I presume, is aware that it is intended on the part of the Treasury and the Government to discontinue the harbour of Portpatrick, and that measures have been taken with that view. What is to be done is not absolutely decided upon, because negotiations are now on foot with the Commissioners of Supply, the local authority of the district, with a view to their taking the harbour under their care if they should think fit to do so. If, however, the harbour should be discontinued, the light will not be maintained, because it is believed that it is of no value to passing ships, and is only useful as long as the harbour is continued. Of course, if it can be shown that it is useful, some arrangement may be made; but at present the information before the Board of Trade is that the harbour will not be necessary in future, and if the harbour be discontinued the light will not be maintained.

THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION. QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that India advanced £6,589,100 towards the expenses of the Abyssinian War; whether of this amount £3,089,100 is still due by England to India; whether it is true that India had to borrow a portion of the amount thus advanced from the Bank of Bengal; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government intend that England or India should pay the interest due upon this loan?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said: On the 17th of December last the Government of India telegraphed to us that they had expended for the purposes of the Abyssinian Expedition, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, the sum of £7,000,000. Since that time I have had no official communication whatever from the Government of India, and am, therefore, unable to say what have been the financial proceedings of the Government of India, or to answer that portion of the hon. Gentleman's Question which relates to the Bank of Bengal. The sum already paid to India on account of the expedition was £4,000,000.

POOR LAW (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. M'MAHON said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is his intention to introduce, during this Session, a Bill to assimilate the Poor Law of Ireland to that of England, by enlarging the area of rating from parishes or electoral districts to unions?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE replied, that the Government had no intention of legislating on the question during the present Session. It was a matter of great importance, and one that would require a great deal of consideration before the Government could come to any conclusion on the subject.

RETURNS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Why a Return, ordered by the House on the 11th of May last, has not been sent in?

MR. MONSELL replied, that the Return, which would embrace a vast variety of details, was being prepared with great care, and would shortly be ready. He might add that similar information would for the future be supplied at the beginning of every year.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—ARREST OF A YOUNG GIRL.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a letter in The Times Newspaper, signed W. Williams, and dated 19, Broad Street, Bloomsbury, in which it is stated that a girl under fourteen years of age has been taken away from the Girls' Refuge at Ealing by the Sheriff's Officers for a supposed debt of £53 11s. 2d., and conveyed to Whitecross Prison; and, whether there was any truth in the alleged statement? He would further ask whether the right hon. Gentlemen was prepared, in case the story were true, to take any, and if so, what, steps in relation to the matter?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. BRUCE replied, that his attention had only been called to the statement by reading that morning the Question placed on the Paper by the hon. Baronet. Since that time he had made all the inquiries which were possible, and had ascertained that not only was one young girl of thirteen taken by the Sheriff's officers to Whitecross Prison, but that two sisters, aged fourteen and seventeen, were imprisoned at the same time for costs incurred in an action at law. It was supposed that the committals had been made by a Judge under some mistake. He had given instructions that further inquiries should be made, and if the hon. Baronet would repeat his Question on another day he hoped to be able to give him a fuller and more complete Answer.

FUNDS OF TRADES UNIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it be his intention to bring in a Bill for the purpose of legalizing the Funds of Trade Unionists?

MR. BRUCE said, he had been informed that the Act passed during the last Session, and introduced to the House by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southampton (Mr. Russell Gurney), did effect the object of legalizing the funds of trades unions. That was, however, but a temporary measure, and whatever else remained to be done would be done when the Report of the Trades Union Commission was presented, and when the Government had time to take that Report into their consideration.

MR. HADFIELD asked, When the Report was likely to be presented?

MR. BRUCE said, it would be presented in a very short time; but he could not say whether it would be in a few days or weeks.

HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. CARNEGIE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the abolition of the Landlord's right of Hypothec in Scotland, said, the measure was identical with that which he had introduced two years ago, and which had then been fully considered by the House. He had included in the Bill the rights of landlords in urban as well as in agricultural districts, and the House would consider in Committee whether they would adopt that proposal. He might mention that, finding it would suit the convenience of Scotch Members that the second reading should be taken in May, he would postpone the further consideration of the measure till that month.

MR. DYCE NICOL, in seconding the Motion, thanked the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Carnegie) for bringing forward thus early a Bill on a subject which has caused so much unsatisfactory feeling in Scotland, and which the legislation of 1867 has failed to diminish. He expressed a hope that in the proposed Bill the hon. Member would avoid connecting urban with agricultural hypothec, which was the chief cause of the failure of his former Bill on this subject. If the occupiers of house property are aggrieved by the law as it now stands, let them agitate for its total abolition, but until such was the case, he hoped that the hon. Member would limit his Bill to that form of protection which was considered by a large majority of the agricultural and commercial classes in Scotland so objectionable and so opposed to their interests.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the abolition of the Landlord's right of Hypothec in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by MR. CARNEGIE, MR. FORDYCE, and MR. CRAUTER.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in rising to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Law relating to Endowed Schools and other Educational Endowments in England, and otherwise to provide for the advancement of Education, said, he did not intend to detain the House long now, but perhaps he might be allowed, in a future stage of the Bill, to enter into the matter more fully. The public had been prepared for a measure of this description by the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission, of which he had happened to be a member. He could not, therefore, speak of its labours; but, as one of its members, he wished to be considered responsible for the whole of their Report. It was a Commission composed of gentlemen of different political and religious opinions, who had been fortunate enough to present an entirely unanimous Report. Two of the Members of that Commission, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn and the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) among them, were unable to remain to the end in consequence of their having accepted high Office; but the fact that they resigned their seats on the Commission by no means implied that they objected to the Report—indeed, he believed that if they had remained, they would have assented with the rest. The object of the Commission was to inquire into the condition of all Endowed Schools in England and Wales which had not been inquired into by two previous Commissions, the one presided over by the Duke of Newcastle to consider assisted schools, elementary schools assisted by Votes of Parliament; and the other presided over by the Earl of Clarendon, which was appointed to inquire into nine special public schools. A measure based upon the Report of the Public Schools Commission had been passed last year through the instrumentality of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole); and the Bill which he now asked leave to introduce, carried out to a great extent in some respects, and in others almost entirely, the recommendations of the Schools Inquiry Commission. The principal object of the Bill was to reform the organization of the Endowed Schools of England and Wales. But there was one important difference between the Bill and the Report of the Commission. The Report recommended not merely that the Endowed Schools should be put on an improved footing, but that a power should be taken of inspecting, and he might say of managing, them; not merely that there should be power given to make fresh trusts, but that there should be power given to see that the trustees did their duty. The Commissioners had proposed the creation of provincial Boards throughout the country, under the control of a central authority, for this purpose. He was still of the opinion, as he was when he sat on the Commission, that very much might be said in favour of this machinery; but on full consideration the Government had come to the conclusion of not recommending the House to adopt that machinery at present, and, while taking power for the immediate reform and re-organization of Endowed Schools, they did not take any power for their inspection and management beyond the power which was at present in the hands of the Charity Commissioners. Therefore, so far as regarded the re-organization of the schools, they proposed that the Bill should be a temporary Bill. They asked for power for three or four years, to make fresh trust-deeds for Endowed Schools, which should, after approval by Government, be laid before Parliament, but should not become law if objected to by either House of Parliament. But they had seen no difficulty in providing a permanent plan for the examination of schools and for giving certificates of competence to schoolmasters, and in this they had followed the recommendations of the Commissioners. The Commissioners recommended an Examining Council, which would consist of twelve members, and as it was thought there would be more confidence in this body if it were not nominated entirely by Government, six of the members would be appointed by the Universities of Cambridge, Oxford, and London, and six by the Crown. This Council would have power to examine the scholars in all Endowed Schools, and to give certificates to schoolmasters based upon their own examination, or to endorse the certificates given by other bodies; it was also proposed by the Bill that all future masters should be obliged to hold these certificates; but existing schoolmasters would, of course, be held competent to teach without them. The Commissioners also desired to bring about some examination of private schools as well as of Endowed Secular Schools; and the Government felt it would not be doing its duty if it did not provide some means for improving secondary education generally. The Government was naturally very anxious to avoid any interference with the right of private schoolmasters; but felt it would be nothing less than a boon to private schoolmasters to offer them the same examination as was made compulsory in the case of masters of Endowed Schools, provided they fulfilled the same conditions as were fulfilled by the Endowed Schools. The Bill also proposed to open exhibitions under certain conditions for the scholars in private schools. It was perhaps unnecessary further to detain the House by describing the measure at greater length, as it would be in the hands of Members probably to-morrow afternoon, but certainly by Saturday morning. He pleaded for speedy legislation on the subject, because the inquiries which had been made had given the impression that some change was impending, and the variety of interests concerned, including that of the parents, demanded the immediate attention of Parliament. He, therefore, proposed to ask for a second reading on Thursday next, that the progress of the Bill might not be stopped by more urgent Business. Ample time, however, would be given for the consideration of questions raised on the second reading before the House was asked to go into Committee on the measure.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked what authority would draw up the new trust deeds?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Bill provided for the appointment of a small Commission, which would prepare the schemes and give notice to all the parties interested, and, after the schemes were settled, would submit them to the Educational Department of the Privy Council, and the Department would, on its own responsibility, after approval, lay them before Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he did not mean to offer any opposition to the Motion for the introduction of the Bill. He believed, indeed, that, after the Report of the Commissioners, it would be idle for any one to attempt to place himself in antagonism to such a proposal. But he did not think they should make good speed by having recourse to the great haste which the right hon. Gentleman recommended. When it was proposed to deal with interests so complicated as those involved, extending as they did to every parish throughout the country, he thought a week hardly sufficient to consider the measure. He should therefore suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the second reading should be postponed until that day fortnight.

LORD HENLEY said, he hoped the second reading would not be pushed on so rapidly, because all Members who were managers of Endowed Schools would like to see their co-managers, and hear their opinions of the measure before it was read a second time. He wished to know whether, according to the right hon. Gentleman's scheme, if an Endowed School was already under the inspection of Government, it was intended to take it away and place it under the inspection of the Council it was proposed to establish; and, secondly, whether the Council would be able to make grants such as the Government Inspector now made?

MR. HADFIELD, while ready to give his hearty support to the Bill, and most anxious that it should have the fullest possible consideration, suggested that Her Majesty's Government would do well to make a division of labour between the House of Commons and the House of Lords, by introducing a larger number of non-political and party measures like this Bill of the right hon. Gentleman and the Bill for the reform of the Law of Bankruptcy in the other House, where there were many noble and learned Lords who would devote an amount of attention to them that could not be given in the House of Commons. Unless some arrangement of that kind was made it would be quite impossible for the House of Commons to give the proper time and consideration to the important measures which the Government had taken in hand.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU added his protest to that of other hon. Members against the course which it was proposed to adopt with respect to this Bill. It was of great magnitude and importance, and if it were to have any effect at all it would determine the character, and therefore the future history, of the people of this country. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, what was the object of the Bill if it was not to improve, or to alter the character of the people? What was the meaning of it, if not to improve and extend education throughout the country; and what was education, but a raising of the character and enlarging of the mental capacities? The Bill would thus affect the whole country, and yet it was attempted to hurry it through for weal or woe, with not more than a week's consideration; although in the case of measures of much smaller importance, and which only partially affected the country, time was always demanded and freely given for their consideration. He protested against such a hurry. This was a most complex and difficult measure, and yet only a few of its points had been explained by the right hon. Gentleman. He had argued that the proposed scheme was only to be transitory, and that, therefore, it would be not injurious to arrive at a hasty conclusion upon it. The same argument might, with equal force, have been applied to the Bribery Bill of last year. That measure was only passed for a few years, and yet the House took much time to consider and debate its provisions. Besides, though the Bill be transitory, its effects would be permanent, and would spread through the whole country from north to south. They ought to be very cautious therefore how they passed the Bill, for once passed it would cause weal or woe, and its results could not be recalled. The right hon. Gentleman said that the principle of his measure was merely that something must be done, and that this had already been affirmed by the Public Schools Bill. Certainly it might be said that the principle had been conceded, if the only principle of the Schools Bill was that grammar schools required some reform. But the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do much more than ever had been conceded. He proposed to erect a Council, to have a body of Examiners, and to issue a paid Commission, which was to roam over the whole country and visit every school, and prepare and impose large schemes of reform. Besides all this there were many details connected with the measure which had not been explained, but which the right hon. Gentleman had promised to explain in a long speech on the second reading. These details might very seriously affect the character of education; yet they could pronounce no opinion upon them for lack of information as to their character. He maintained that every facility should be given to the trustees of these schools to consider what was to be done before any action was taken. It was not the custom of Parliament to meddle with any interests, however small, without giving ample opportunity to all who were to be affected to express their opinions upon the subject. And yet what was the right hon. Gentleman going to do in this, which was one of the most important of all cases? Why, he was going to organize grammar schools throughout the country. What did that mean? It meant that grammar schools belonging to the first grade might be turned into schools of the second or third grade, or vice versa. It meant further that these same schools might be removed out of the boroughs in which they were situated, and placed in the counties. He had no doubt that all this would be done by the paid Commission which was to be issued. Upon these subjects the trustees might have something to say. What was to be the size or the expense of that Commission were points upon which they had no information. He must beg, therefore, a little longer time from the right hon. Gentleman—a fortnight at least. There was one other point worthy of consideration. His right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had said, the other night, he thought it a great pity that a general scheme of education had not been brought in. In that opinion he entirely agreed. The education of boys was essentially the same, in whatever grade of life the boys might happen to be born. These grades were merely an arbitrary classification, very useful no doubt for explaining the views of the Commissioners, but there was no reality in them, and therefore nothing could be built upon them. What were those grades? The Commissioners explained them in this way,—they put those boys in the first grade who left school between the ages of sixteen and eighteen, boys in the second grade who left school between fourteen and sixteen, and those who were taken away between twelve and fourteen in the third grade. But he did not see why a boy who did not leave school until a month after sixteen should be in a different grade from one who left it a month before, or if the grades were anything, they might just as well be extended downwards throughout the education of the poor. Some boys were taken away at twelve, in order to go to labour; some as early as six or seven, and thus the question was exactly the same whether it was secondary or elementary education. These grades were merely another name for that which had always been spoken of as the effect of “labour claims.” He did not see why the Government should attempt to deal with secondary education on a different principle from elementary education. But, however that might be, he would not urge these considerations in a carping spirit, but he would urge on the right hon. Gentleman that he should not take the second reading of the Bill that night week, but should give at least a fortnight before proceeding further with the measure.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he did not wish to travel into the details of the Bill, but he also desired to enter his protest against proceeding so quickly with it. An appeal for delay had been made on behalf of the school trustees—a large body of men of very various social habits and difficult to bring together—but there was another class of men who would perhaps be even more vitally affected by the measure, and that was the schoolmasters, many of whom were gentlemen and men of high education, graduates of the Universities. He would like to appeal on their behalf. He thought it very unfair that a body of men like the schoolmasters of these Endowed Schools should not have ample time given them to consider the Bill and confer with the trustees, and then communicate with such Members of this House as they had a right to look to to watch their interests. Any alteration in the system of Endowed Schools would deal with the interests of both these classes, not to speak of that their greatest class the interests of the people at large, and therefore they should be given ample opportunity to consider what was proposed to be done.

MR. WALTER ventured to add his protest to those already expressed by hon. Members, and to request his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) to give them more time to look into that subject before the second reading of the Bill. He did so on a ground which had not yet been urged. There were a great number of new Members in that House—about 200, he believed—and of those Gentlemen probably a large proportion had not had time to read the Report of the Commission of which his right hon. Friend was a member. On the principle of “the more haste, the less speed,” it was very important that Gentlemen who took an interest in education should approach that subject with some considerable knowledge of its bearings. In order to do that, it was very necessary that they should have read the Report, which, with the accompanying volumes of evidence, formed a very bulky series of works. It would be as well for hon. Gentlemen who had seen the Report to look over it again and refresh their memories; but to do that in a week was more than was possible. He had not a word now to say against the Bill, for he had not the smallest idea of what its provisions might be; but this they knew, that there was to be the element of compulsion in it, and the mere use of that expression rendered him very anxious to make himself pretty well acquainted with the merits of the subject before they went to the second reading. His right hon. Friend proposed to bring a considerable amount of compulsion to bear both upon the scholars and the teachers of these institutions. That might be very necessary; but, undoubtedly, it was a very important alteration in our scholastic system, and it formed a sufficient reason why a fortnight should be given them to look over the volumes to which he had referred, in order that they might come to the discussion of the question with some accurate knowledge of its details.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE suggested whether some of the inconveniences that had been alluded to might not be obviated if the Government were to send down a copy of the Bill to the head masters and trustees of these schools.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in answer to his noble Friend (Lord Henley), explained that it was simply proposed that there should be an examination of the scholars and also of the masters for a certificate of fitness. It was not proposed to extend the operation of the Bill to any Endowed School which was at present in receipt of any assistance from the money annually voted by Parliament. With regard to the representation made to him by hon. Gentlemen on both sides that he ought not to attempt to take the second reading so early as next week, after conference with his right hon. Friend (Mr. H. A. Bruce) he wished to yield to that representation. He hardly did so, however, on the ground given by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu), who seemed to suppose the Bill would have a greater effect than he himself ventured to expect from it. The noble Lord said it was "to improve the character of the people," a work which, even if begun next week, would not be disadvantageous. But it was exceedingly to be regretted if the persons likely to be affected by the measure—and he hoped beneficially affected—should imagine that there was any attempt to carry it through suddenly and without due consideration. In moving an early day for the second reading, he had done so with the full intention that ample time should be given before the next stage was taken, and it would really be convenient to all interested to allow that course to be taken, on the understanding that the House might consider its views before the Bill went into Committee. He wished, however, to yield to the desire of hon. Gentlemen present, and he hoped the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) would induce all his friends to study the Report of the Commissioners, though it was to be feared even the time he had mentioned would not be sufficient to read all the twelve volumes. With the permission of the House he would put the second reading for Monday, the 8th of March.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Endowed Schools and other Educational Endowments in England, and otherwise to provide for the advancement of Education, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 3.]

PARTY PROCESSIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. W. JOHNSTON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill "to repeal an Act, intituled 'An Act to restrain Party Processions in Ireland,'" said, he hoped the House would extend to him the usual courtesy, and allow the Bill to be introduced and read the first time. He trusted that, on the second reading, he would be able to lay such reasons before the House as would induce it to concur in the repeal of that Act, believing, as he did, that its repeal would be in accordance with justice and equity, and calculated to promote the prosperity, welfare, and peace of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

THE O'DONOGHUE seconded the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to repeal an Act intituled "An Act to restrain Party Processions in Ireland," ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSTON and The O'DONOGHUE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 6.]

FOREIGN MAILS.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Return, ordered by the House of Commons on the 24th July 1868, of the number of Foreign Mails daily to and from London, via France and via Belgium, and the capitals and chief cities in Europe and Turkey, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that the Return was now ready, and would be laid upon the table as soon as an order was made to that effect. An order was made in the last Parliament; but it would be necessary that it should be repeated before the Return could be presented.

THE TREASURY BOARD.

QUESTION.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table the Treasury Minute or Minutes regulating the position and functions of the several members of the present Treasury Board?

MR. AYRTON stated that the Treasury Minute referred to would be laid upon the table at the next sitting of the House.

ARMY—TRAINING OF THE IRISH MILITIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, If the practice of calling out for training annually the English, Welsh, and Scotch Regiments of Militia, and, at the same time, neglecting to afford similar advantages to the Irish Regiments, is to be longer continued; and, if so, for what reason? The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said this was the fifth year that the Irish regiments of militia had not been called out.

COLONEL FORDE also asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to call out the Irish Militia this year for training?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, who rose to answer the Questions, said, that some weeks since his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had asked the Irish Government whether they were desirous that the Irish Militia should be embodied during the present year. The question received very careful consideration indeed at the hands of the Irish Government, and it was decided that, on the whole, it would be better to defer that operation for the present—he might say only for another year. He need scarcely remind his right hon. and gallant Friend that they had not yet begun to undertake the task of governing Ireland under the provisions of the ordinary law, and if any error were committed it would be better that that error should be on the side of caution.

PORTUGAL—CASE OF MR. J. CASSELLS, A BRITISH SUBJECT. QUESTION.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received information that Mr. James Cassells, a British subject residing and carrying on business at Oporto, was sentenced in November last by a Portuguese Court to banishment for six years, for the crime of "wanting in respect to the Roman Catholic religion," such want of respect consisting only in conducting an ordinary Protestant service in his own house; whether this sentence is not an infringement of the religious liberty guaranteed to British subjects in Portugal by the Treaty of Lisbon in 1842; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have received any Memorial, or made any and what representations to the Portuguese Government on the subject?

MR. OTWAY said, it was true that Mr. James Cassells, a British subject residing and carrying on business in Oporto, was sentenced in November last by a Portuguese Court to banishment for six years; but his hon. and learned Friend was incorrect in saying that it was for the crime of "wanting in respect to the Roman Catholic religion," such want of respect consisting only in conducting an ordinary Protestant service in his own house. The facts of the case were these:—Mr. Cassells was put upon his trial before the Judge of the Court of first Instance at Oporto, and a Portuguese jury, having waived his privilege to a mixed jury, and two distinct charges were submitted to the jury by the presiding Judge in the following terms:—

1. Was it proved that the prisoner, acting in contravention of the religion of the country, by law established, had held meetings in his own house composed of individuals residing in his own parish and in the neighbourhood; 2. Was it proved that he had by reading, by speech, or by act induced three individuals to hold doctrines at variance with the religion of the country, and had he endeavoured to make proselytes and converts to a religion not approved by the Church? The Judge further submitted the following point in extenuation:—Were the good conduct and charities of the prisoner, at the time of his alleged criminal act, proved as an extenuating circumstance in his favour? Of these three points the jury decided the first two in the affirmative, by majorities, and they unanimously assented to the last proposition. The Judge, in conformity with Article 130 of the Penal Code, sentenced Mr. Cassells to banishment from the kingdom for a period of six years, and to pay the costs of trial. Mr. Cassells immediately appealed to a Superior Court, and the result of that appeal was not yet known at the Foreign Office. Of course his hon. and learned Friend would see that pending that appeal it would not be in conformity with the custom of the Government to take any further proceedings in the matter. It appears that the authorities undertook these proceedings against Mr. Cassells with very great reluctance, and that they spared no efforts to induce him to desist from practices which they considered to be illegal. However, his hon. and learned Friend must not suppose that the matter was one of indifference to the British Government. The interests of Mr. Cassella had been watched over by Mr. Crawford, the British Consul at Oporto, who had instructed counsel to attend; and Her Majesty's Minister had been instructed to request of the Portuguese Government that no delay should take place in having the appeal heard. When the result of that appeal reached Her Majesty's Government it would be for them to consider whether it was necessary to take any further proceedings or not. With regard to the other part of the Question he might say, that the Earl of Clarendon had received communications from the Wesleyan body and also from the Scottish Reformation Society on the subject.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, the second part of his Question had not been answered.

MR. OTWAY said, it would be premature to give any opinion upon that until they knew the result of the appeal, and had an opportunity of considering the evidence.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1867.—THE RATE-PAYING CLAUSES. QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES FORSTER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to repeal the Ratepaying Clauses of the Reform Act, and to restore the system of Compound Rating?

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend is perfectly warranted in asking a Question on the matter, which has excited considerable interest in the country. I am afraid, however, I must ask his indulgence, in so far that it would not be possible for me fully and clearly to make known the intentions of the Government in answer to the Question, without anticipating the statement which is to be made in a few days by my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Goschen). To answer his Question according to the letter, however, I may say that we do not propose to repeal the ratepaying clauses of the Reform Act, or to restore, in the letter, the system of compound rating. We recognize the existence of a practical grievance and desire to apply a remedy without at the same time re-opening the political controversies of the Reform Act. I think my hon. Friend will find, when the plan of the Government is before him, as it will be in the course of a few days, that, although we do not in the letter and form restore the system of compound rating, we do obtain from the remedy which we propose to apply those advantages which that system is calculated to secure.

CAPE COLONY— ENSLAVEMENT OF KAFFIR CHILDREN. QUESTION.

MR. R. FOWLER said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the systematic enslavement of Kaffir children by the Boers of the Transvaal Republic; whether any step have been taken to induce the authorities to fulfil that provision of the Treaty of 1852 which prohibited slavery; and, whether there is any objection to produce on an early day all the Correspondence on this subject which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Governor of the Cape Colony or any other persons either in this Country or in South Africa? He must ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while he entered into some explanation. It might be in the recollection of the House that the Boers were a people of Dutch origin who originally settled at the Cape, but, in consequence of the passing of the Emancipation Act of 1834, they, having been large holders of Hottentot slaves, considered their rights invaded and left the Cape, moving northwards across the Vaal, where they settled in one of the finest tracts of land in South Africa. There they were a source of very great difficulty, owing to their constant contests with the Native tribes, and occasional hostility towards the British Government. Lord Grey, in a despatch dated November, 1850, said—

"It is clear that the Boers have not the slightest claim to the territory which they occupy beyond the Vaal river, and I trust that no time will be lost in carrying into effect the measures which I have recommended for encouraging and assisting the Native tribes whom they are oppressing to assert their rights, and to defend themselves."

A treaty was made by the British Government with the Transvaal Boers in 1852, by which the independence of the South African Republic was acknowledged. This convention with the Boers who crossed the Vaal river under Pretorius was drawn up on the 16th of January, 1852, between Major W. S. Hogge and Mr. C. M. Owen, Commissioners for settling and adjusting the eastern and north-eastern boundaries of the Cape Colony on the one part, and on the other, a deputation of emigrant farmers residing north of the Vaal river, and was generally favourable to the Boers. It contained these two articles—

“It is agreed that no slavery is, or shall be, permitted or practised in the country to the north of the Vaal River by the emigrant farmers.

“It is agreed that no objection shall be made by any British authority against the emigrant Boers purchasing their supplies of ammunition in any of the British colonies and possessions in South Africa, it being mutually understood that all trade in ammunition with the Native tribes is prohibited, both by the British Government and the emigrant farmers on both sides of the Vaal River.”

The effect of this convention was to place the Native tribes at the mercy of the Boers, who were able to secure an unlimited supply of ammunition, while the Native tribes were cut off from it. The result was that a system of slavery had grown up, and 6,000 children were now held in slavery by the Boers. In support of the statement, he could cite Dr. Livingstone, who, in a memorial to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), when he was Colonial Secretary, on the 12th of December, 1852, stated that, owing to a quarrel between the Boers and the Natives among whom he was residing, the Native town in which he lived was attacked and destroyed, his own house was plundered and his property taken. He was obliged in consequence to enter upon that course of travels which immortalized his name. In conversation, Dr. Livingstone told him (Mr. R. Fowler) that on a subsequent visit to the country of the Boers he found among them children who had been brought up in his own missionary schools, and who were detained in slavery by the Boers. Evidence as to the horrors attending this system of slavery had been adduced by residents of Natal; and its Legislative Council, on the 10th of August last, passed a series of resolutions on the subject, in which they declared—but he should not rest his case on any private information however respectable—

VOL. CXCV. [THIRD SERIES.]

“That ever since the annexation of the Orange River Sovereignty (since abandoned) in 1848, the emigrant farmers who settled over the Vaal River, and formed a Government of their own, under the style of the South African Republic, have carried on a system of slavery, under the guise of child apprenticeship—such children being the result of raids carried on against Native tribes, whose men are slaughtered, but whose children and property are seized, the one being enslaved and sold as ‘apprentices,’ the other being appropriated:

“That the existence of this system of slavery, attended as it is by indescribable atrocities and evils, is a notorious fact to all persons acquainted with the Trans-vaal Republic; that these so-called ‘destitute children’ are bought and sold under the denomination of ‘black ivory;’ that these evils were fully admitted by persons officially cognizant of them at a public meeting held in Potchefstroom, the chief town of the Republic, in April, 1868, and that the whole subject has been brought fully under the notice of the High Commissioner.”

The Trans-vaal Argus, a paper published in the South African Republic, reported a public meeting, held at the house of a field cornet, for the purpose of considering certain proceedings of the Volksraad, in relation to the Natives, at which terrible pictures were drawn of the suffering entailed by the raids and of the slavery to which the children were reduced. It was stated that in one case a number of children, too young to be removed, were collected in a heap and burned alive. In another case, it appeared that a field cornet had possessed himself of a Native child, whose mother had been fired at and wounded, and left on the road until picked up by some Kaffirs, who had her conveyed to their kraal, where she died next day. Mr. Robinson, an Englishman, Chairman of the Volksraad, the Legislative Council of the South African Republic, was reported to have said—

“He was of opinion that it was right and proper conduct to shoot down the miserable Kaffirs. If it had been he he would have acted similarly, and he wished the last Kaffir was out of the world.”

From the papers published in the South African Republic, it appeared that negotiations had been going on for some time for the recognition of the Republic by the Prussian Government, and the last number of the Trans-vaal Argus received in this country announced that a Prussian Consul to the Republic had actually been appointed. Considering the limited commercial relations of the Republic with Prussia, such an appointment was unnecessary and, therefore, mysterious. Seeing that the evidence of the atrocities could not be doubted, that they were vouched for by the Natal Legislative Council, and that this country acknowledged the independence of the South African Republic on the express condition that no slavery should exist in the Republic, he thought the matter was one worthy a few moments' attention from the House. At all events, he hoped it would receive the attention of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and of the distinguished Statesman who presided over the Colonial Office.

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, he was sure the House would agree that no apology was required from the hon. Member for having brought this most important question, in a speech of studied moderation, before the House. Every statement made by the hon. Gentleman he was obliged to endorse. Her Majesty's Government had not any precisely official information, because we had no diplomatic agent in the Trans-vaal Republic; but at the same time the Government had received, both from the Governor of the Cape and the Governor of Natal, and from Her Majesty's Commissioner to the Mixed Court held at the Cape, statements fully corroborating all that had been said by the hon. Member. There could be no doubt that, in contravention of a solemn treaty, there existed an organized system of slavery in the Trans-vaal Republic. The system was the sending forth of commandos to kidnap Kaffir children, whose parents were murdered in order to render the children destitute orphans, on which plea they were subjected to so-called apprenticeship for a long term of years, that apprenticeship being slavery. For several years past the attention of successive Governments had been called to this matter. In 1865 it was brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman now the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Cardwell) by the then Governor, Sir Philip Wodehouse, and instructions were given him to address a strong remonstrance to the Governor of the Trans-vaal Republic. This and subsequent remonstrances when Lord Carnarvon was Secretary of State for the Colonies, had not produced any effect, and about a month before the late Government went out of Office, the Duke of Buckingham gave authority to the Governor of the Cape to withdraw from the inhabitants of the Trans-vaal Republic the permission to receive ammunition and arms from the British colonists. That was a curious and unjust clause in the Treaty of 1852 which permitted arms and ammunition to be sold to the inhabitants of the Republic and prohibited their being sold to the Kaffirs; but now both were placed on the same footing. In asking what steps the Government were going to take in this matter, the hon. Gentleman must remember the great distance between any of our settlements and the Trans-vaal Republic, and the impossibility of our acting upon the Republic by any but moral means. In the able pamphlet published on this subject it was said that moral means would probably be sufficient, and at all events Her Majesty's Government were not desirous of resorting to any other, but they were willing to do all that they could in that direction. What they most trusted to was the contrast which our settlement at Natal presented to the barbarous system which prevailed in the Trans-vaal Republic. In Natal there were about 250,000 Natives, a large number of whom had come in from other districts in order to have the advantage of British protection. Among them barbarous customs were rapidly disappearing, and civilization rapidly progressing; they were cultivating the land and starting sugar manufactories, which were worked by steam power; and the material interests of the community were being immensely promoted, and the public revenues increased by the freedom of the Native population. Some 20,000 young men, Kaffirs, were employed every year in the Natal settlement by the European settlers. We must trust that when their neighbours of the Trans-vaal Republic saw the effect of justice and equity in dealing with the Native population, when they saw that the Natives were capable of civilization, and that their labour could be procured without any of those atrocities by which they sought to obtain it, they would adopt those principles of justice which in the Natal district had proved so conducive to the material interests of the colony. If the hon. Member would move for the Papers he had referred to, there would not be the least objection to produce them.

MR. GILPIN said, he was equally gratified with the manner in which the Question had been brought forward, and the Answer which had been given, for the Government could not be asked to do more than exercise a moral influence to put a stop to this slavery, and, happily, English influence was great in that district. He had some relations with Natal, and had communications from the colony every month, and he believed that the case against the Transvaal Republic had not been overstated. It was a pity that when we had abolished slavery in the West it should be continued in the East in this gross form.

PROPOSED VIADUCT ON THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ELCHO said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works a Question relative to the Viaduct from Charing Cross Bridge to Wellington Street, Strand, proposed to be made on the Thames Embankment by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The importance and urgency of the subject induced him to bring it forward early in the Session. Its importance might be gathered from the fact that it amounted simply to this—whether £245,000 of ratepayers' money was to be unprofitably expended on a scheme which would occupy a large portion of the Thames Embankment, reclaimed from the river at great cost, destroy a magnificent site for a public building, and give in return a roadway of little or no value to the public? The Board of Works was blameless in the matter, as it was bound by an Act of Parliament to carry out the scheme. The connection of the Board with the Viaduct scheme was briefly this:—The Metropolitan Commission of Sewers, created under the 11 & 12 Vict., became by the 18 & 19 Vict. the Metropolitan Board of Works, a body invested with enormous taxing powers, and charged with the duty of carrying out metropolitan improvements. The Thames Embankment, though originally recommended by Sir Christopher Wren, and more seriously proposed by Sir Frederick Trench in 1824, owed its construction in a great measure to a suggestion of that very able man, Sir John Thwaites, during the consideration of the proposal to carry the sewage of the metropolis to the mouth of the Thames. Sir Joseph Paxton took up the idea, a Committee of the House reported favourably upon it, a Royal Commission did the same, and in 1862 Parliament entrusted the Board of Works with the duty of constructing the Embankment. The scheme involved the making of approaches to the Embankment from the Strand. Part of the scheme was a roadway from the neighbourhood of Charing Cross to Wellington Street, in the Strand, or, properly speaking, Lancaster Place. When the matter was handed over to the Metropolitan Board of Works, they did not think that the best line of road, so they proposed another. A Committee of the House of Commons sat upon it. There were various schemes, with a detailed account of which he would not trouble the House; but last year a Bill was passed, laying down a line of road, and under that Bill the Metropolitan Board of Works, whatever their own feelings might be, were obliged to carry out the Viaduct he had described, and which was so much objected to. It was true the Board had not yet accepted contracts for the work, but they had issued the necessary notices, and tenders had been advertised for, and, unless Parliament stepped in, the work would have to be gone on with, because the hands of the Board were absolutely tied. A very strong feeling on the subject had arisen in the metropolis during the last fortnight. The Rev. Henry White, chaplain of the Savoy Chapel, had given a very clear description of the roadway in a letter to the Editor of The Times, and in company with himself and others had stated the reasons against making it to the First Commissioner of Works, who, he was glad to say, appeared to sympathize with the object of the deputation. The points laid before the right hon. Gentleman were the expense and waste which the construction of the Viaduct would involve, its unsightliness when completed, and the destruction of a most admirable site for a public building. The objectors to the scheme included the District Board of Works, represented on the deputation by Mr. Jones, who said the Board had never been consulted upon the subject, and had petitioned against the work as soon as its true character became known. He had that evening presented a petition from St. James's Vestry, declaring the proposed structure unsightly, and of questionable utility for purposes of traffic. The House was merely asked to postpone the work for a time until it had been positively ascertained whether this Viaduct was necessary, in addition to those two main thoroughfares, the Embankment and the Strand, one of which was as yet unopened. It had been suggested that the Viaduct was designed more as a ready means of communication between Downing Street and Whitehall and Somerset House than for the public convenience; but in any case it was not too much that Parliament should be asked to stay the hand of the Metropolitan Board—which really did not want to carry out the work—if it were only to preserve the eight acres of reclaimed land as a site for some public building. He invited any hon. Member who had not already done so to take a walk on the Embankment, and what would he see? In the first place, he would see executed by the Metropolitan Board of Works the finest granite wall in the world; and if he went as far as Waterloo Bridge he would find Somerset House and that beautiful bridge on the one side, and almost as a matter of necessity something was required by way of balance on the other. If they should have nothing of the kind, the result would be that this beautiful spot, so well adapted for the ornament of the metropolis, would be occupied by a road or viaduct, which, however constructed, must necessarily be a very great eyesore. They all knew that the buildings on the spot where this Viaduct would be were not ornamental, and, unless negotiations were entered into between the Government and the proprietors, all that the latter would look to was to see that they had made of their property the most profitable investment. They might have warehouses or dwelling-houses, factories or gas works, on the spot, or, in short, anything which would be most profitable to the owners. Now, there was an important moral and an important principle involved in this matter. The moral he held to be this:—whether in this metropolis, where so many important railway and other works were to be constructed, there was to be any controlling power? At present there was none—absolutely none. That was a state of things which ought not to exist in this metropolis, and which existed in no other metropolis in the world. It was the fault of the House of Commons, which did not give sufficient power to any authority to step in and interfere. He would give an illustration of what he meant. Take the South-Western Railway, for instance. Suppose it wanted to extend from the south to the north of London, and to join the Great Northern. What had it to do? Simply to deposit its plans, its estimates, and all that was required by the Board of Trade within a certain day; it came then before Parliament, and its scheme was submitted to a Committee of that House. Now that Committee took no cognizance whatever of the nature of the works, so far as affected the beauty of the metropolis, whether they would destroy it or not. If the plans were deposited, the money lodged, and the public requirements of traffic seemed to render such a railway necessary, the Committee would pass it without further question. What was the result? Why, that they had got Hungerford Bridge, which intercepted the view of the Houses of Parliament from Waterloo Bridge; and with regard to Cannon Street they had got a monstrous tubular station which jutted into the Thames at one side and cut off the view of St. Paul's. Now, if there were any one in the metropolis responsible for its public works those two structures would not have been erected. One of the disadvantages of the divided authority which existed was that the roadway parallel to the Thames, which they all desired to see completed, could not be made for five years, because Parliament in its wisdom had given the Metropolitan District Railway Company power to scoop and burrow under the roadway, and until their railway was constructed the road could not be made. Further, one Committee of the House decided that this Metropolitan Railway Company should run a portion of their line on arches in order that the water-rights of certain persons might be preserved; but subsequently another Committee decided that the railway should be in the inside of an embankment. Therefore they had one Committee deciding one thing, and another another. Why, it was simply because of these divided powers and of there being nobody to control them, and the Board of Works and the Railway Company could not come for such a long time to a settlement about this railway. He had spoken of the ability of Sir John Thwaites and the Metropolitan Board. He had already said that the wall they had erected was the most beautiful river wall in the world. But whom had the public to thank for it? Was it the House, or a Royal Commission, or the Government? Nothing of the kind, it was Sir John Thwaites and the Metropolitan Board of Works. He had said to Sir John Thwaites, "You have made a most beautiful wall; but I just want to ask you, as far as a Committee of the House of Commons, as far as a Royal Commission, as far as the First Commissioner of Works, or any other officer of Government were concerned, might you not have erected anything in the shape of a wall you chose, whether of concrete or of brick?" And the answer was that it was so. He hoped that state of things would be put an end to, that the Government would pay attention to this question, and lay down a new system. He might cite other instances, but he would not. All he wanted was that the Office of the First Commissioner should be so constituted as to have a Board, chosen, he would say, by the Institute of Architects, and with the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works as a member, who would advise the First Commissioner on all these matters. Indeed, the First Commissioner had already made a salutary change by putting Mr. Fergusson, a first-class architect, in the office. The additional Board might be made to consist of two members appointed by the Institute of Architects, two appointed by the Royal Academy, and one appointed by the Metropolitan Board of Works. He believed, with a Board so constituted, no public work could be constructed, and no Act of Parliament sanctioning one could be obtained unless the First Commissioner of Works was satisfied that it would be an embellishment to the metropolis and not the reverse. He had prepared a Resolution on the subject to this effect, that it was not expedient to proceed with the proposed road or Viaduct from Hungerford to Waterloo Bridge until the subject should be submitted for further consideration to a Committee of that House. According to the forms of the House he could not move it now, but he would on Monday next give Notice of a Motion on the subject. He hoped, however, that the First Commissioner would render it unnecessary for him to move any Resolution, by taking the matter up and referring it to either a Royal Commission or a Committee of the House.

MR. BUXTON said, he concurred in the view taken by the noble Lord. He believed the proposed work was a mere blunder on the part of those with whom it had originated. He could not discover that anybody liked this scheme. The Board of Works did not like it, though they were carrying it out; the First Commissioner of Works did not like it; and the ratepayers of London did not like it, because it would involve them in an expenditure of £245,000. He really thought the very finest site in all London for a magnificent public building would be sacrificed if this Viaduct was erected. They were now making the river Thames one of the most beautiful in the world, and it would be the most puerile folly to throw away those eight acres by cutting them asunder by this Viaduct. There really ought to be some one with greater powers than the First Commissioner to judge in such matters; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the House the benefit of his views on the subject.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he was anxious, as a Director of the South Western Railway Company, that it should not go forth to the shareholders that the case hypothetically put by his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) was an actual case. It was not in the contemplation of the Company to throw a bridge across the Thames, or make any extension of their line in the manner imagined by his noble Friend. But he agreed with his noble Friend that if that Railway did wish to make any such extension, there was no controlling authority which could prevent them from disfiguring a magnificent site by erecting there one the greatest monstrosities in the world. He did not say that each separate authority, if left to itself, might not be competent to do what was right in that matter; but the conflict of authority which existed caused the most complete anarchy. Before coming down to the House, he had inspected the site to which his noble Friend alluded, and found the Embankment blocked up with all kinds of work; yet the several works were not to be carried out contemporaneously, but one was to be commenced after another was done. After Sir John Thwaites and his colleagues had finished the Embankment, then came the Metropolitan Railway, which dug up all that had been laid, or burrowed under the Embankment; and that Railway Company had power to deprive the public for five long years of the enjoyment of that Embankment. Nor was that all. Somehow or other—he could not tell in what way, or who was responsible for it—an Act passed through Parliament last Session, further to aggravate the condition of anarchy in which the Thames Embankment stood by the building upon arches of a road, with a gradual slope, that would for ever utterly disfigure and destroy one of the noblest sites in Europe. Every hon. Member to whom he had mentioned the matter had told him that it had come upon him with surprise; indeed, many hon. Gentlemen were quite startled on hearing that such a work was contemplated. He trusted that the House of Commons would put down its foot on that extraordinary state of things, and pause before the Act of last Session was carried out. The ratepayers did not desire this Viaduct, nor did the traffic which now passed along the Strand require it. Indeed, the whole question of the Thames Embankment had been muddled. When it was first projected, all those squalid buildings which abutted on the river, and were valuable only because they so abutted, were not bought up—that would have been a sensible thing—but their water privileges were bought up; and now that the Embankment ran in front of those squalid buildings they had been made five times more valuable than they were before. Thus, having first compensated their owners for their water privileges, they would have to buy the buildings themselves at the enhanced value put upon them by the very construction of that work. All that showed the necessity of establishing some such authority in the metropolis as his noble Friend had indicated.

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) was good enough the other day to attend at the Office of Works with a deputation on that subject, when he made to him a reply which he was very much afraid he could only repeat that evening. The fact was that he had really nothing to do officially with the Thames Embankment, or with anything which might be erected on that great highway. All that he could do—and that he had promised his noble Friend the other day he would do—was to use what personal influence he might have with the Metropolitan Board of Works, and ask them, if possible, to check the construction of the road and Viaduct, which, there could be no doubt, would have the effect described by his noble Friend and other hon. Members who had spoken that evening. The relations between the Metropolitan Board of Works and the First Commissioner of Works, whether official or otherwise, had always been of the most friendly and cordial character, and Sir John Thwaites and Mr. Tite had kindly offered to take such steps as were in their power to delay the progress of the works. But certain notices had been given for the acquisition of a part of the site, which were in the nature of a contract, and must be carried out, although the contract for the works themselves had not been entered into. As First Commissioner of Works, he had no power in that or any other matter to interfere with the Metropolitan Board of Works, or with the operations of any company in the metropolis. His position was frequently much misunderstood, and he was held responsible for many things with which he had nothing to do. It was, for instance, popularly supposed that he was at the head of the Woods and Forests; but such the House knew was not the case. He would look at the question of control over public buildings in the metropolis for a moment from an Imperial and not a mere ratepayers' point of view. The House of Commons had more than once rejected schemes for erecting a National Gallery on different sites which had been proposed, and it had determined that a National Gallery should be erected in Trafalgar Square, at a great expense to the nation, on this ground, among others, that that was one of the finest sites in the world, and that a magnificent view of any building there erected would be obtained from Parliament Street. Well, assuming that building to have been erected at the cost of the nation, what might happen? It was perhaps an extreme supposition, but some railway company might obtain permission to unite the Charing Cross Station with Brompton, and might throw a bridge across the entrance to Parliament Street, which would completely destroy the view of the new National Gallery, for the sake of which a large outlay of public money would have been in-erred. That was a great evil. How it was to be remedied was another question. As First Commissioner of Works he had no power whatever to interfere. On another occasion he might appeal to the House for its opinion on the subject. When the Metropolitan Board of Works was first constituted they could not undertake any work the expense of which exceeded £50,000 without the approval of the First Commissioner of Works; and before entering upon any work exceeding £100,000 they were compelled to obtain the sanction of Parliament. But in 1858 an Act was passed which repealed the sections of the previous Act conferring that power on the First Commissioner and on Parliament. What had been stated in regard to the road in question was strictly true; but the Metropolitan Board of Works were not responsible; their hands were as much tied as his own. When the Thames Embankment Act was passed it was thought by some persons that there ought to be a communication between Wellington Street, Strand, and Parliament Street, in order to divert the traffic, which, it was said, was too great for the Strand. He had strong doubts whether there was any proof that the traffic was too great for the Strand; and it was the opinion of the Metropolitan Board of Works that it would not require dividing at Wellington Street. But the Committee of the House decided that that road should be constructed; so that there would be two nearly parallel roads, one of which would be partly constructed on a Viaduct. The Metropolitan Board of Works at once saw that so hideous a structure as was at first proposed would destroy the whole effect of the Embankment, and would require a great group of buildings to mask it. The Committee, however, rejected the scheme of the Board of Works for a crescent in front of the road and Viaduct. It was first decided that this road should lead from Wellington Street, but as the narrowest part of this street had been selected, the line was altered, and the road was to commence from the corner of Wellington Street and the Strand. But the inhabitants of the Savoy immediately rose against the scheme, and complained that it would disturb their ancient and venerable graveyard. This led to the final change of the plan, by which the communication would start from the broadest part of Wellington Street. A Bill was passed last Session authorizing that deviation; and it was an extraordinary fact that that Bill should have apparently got through the House without discussion, as a fresh opportunity was thus afforded of re-considering the whole question. The Embankment road ran along the north side of the Thames, and it was now proposed that a second road should run from Hungerford Bridge almost parallel with the Embankment road, and should have an ascent of forty feet to Lancaster Place, near Waterloo Bridge; but where the Viaduct nearly reached the level of the Strand—that was, about Salisbury Street and Cecil Street, and would prove some use to the public—power was given to the owners of the property to close those streets with gates, which would intercept the communication with the Strand. After all, the convenience in regard to shortening the distance between the Strand and Parliament Street would not be so great as had been supposed. He had had the distance measured, and found that there was a difference of a few feet only between that route and the route along the Strand into Parliament Street. There was no doubt that in an æsthetic point of view it would be perfectly monstrous to have a roadway gradually rising in the manner he had described and cutting the Embankment diagonally into two parts. The expenditure upon this new work was a serious matter for the consideration of the ratepayers of London. Estimates had already been given in to the extent of £230,000, but that would be very far from representing all that would be required to be paid. A large sum would be required to hide the monstrosity from view as much as possible by the planting of trees. Moreover, there would be a great gap left behind it similar to the one which long existed in Victoria Street, which would form a hideous receptacle for rubbish, dead cats, and other offensive matter; and it would be necessary to put the ratepayers to considerable additional expense to obviate that nuisance by filling up this hollow. But, as he had said before, he had no power to interfere in the matter. Sir John Thwaites and the Board of Works were as much opposed to the making of the road as he was, and he felt assured they would do everything they could to put a stop to its construction; but it would be very difficult for them to effect that object unless they were supported by an expression of the opinion and the authority of the House of Commons. He himself had contemplated the erection of a public building on the site in question, which was one of the best and most central in the metropolis, and the only area sufficiently large and convenient for a good public edifice that could now be obtained, but he suddenly found that he was precluded from carrying out his intention in that respect in consequence of the projected construction of a roadway, which would be of no use to anybody, to which the ratepayers were opposed, and against which he believed every man of taste would protest. It was in that manner that the subject was originally brought under his notice, and he was glad to find that it had been brought under the notice of the House, for it was only by the expression of a decided opinion on its part that the Board of Works would be enabled to interfere with the prosecution of a scheme which would entirely destroy a magnificent site. He thought the course proposed by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) was a perfectly right one. A Committee of the House would be the proper tribunal to inquire respecting what was to be done. The Metropolitan Board of Works was not bound to proceed at once, as three years were allowed to construct the road; therefore there was plenty of time to reverse the decision to which the Committee on the Embankment Bill had come. And even though a few houses were purchased for carrying out the work, that would not cause any great loss — supposing they were bound to bear it.

MR. W. COWPER said he must maintain that ample time had been given to the consideration of this matter. Eight years had elapsed since it was mooted, and therefore it could not be said that the ratepayers living in the precincts of the Savoy had been taken by surprise with respect to the construction of the road. The road was intended to furnish the means of direct communication between the eastern part of the Strand and Westminster Bridge, and its construction formed part of the scheme of the Commission which was appointed by the Crown to recommend a plan of improvement in that quarter of the metropolis in 1861. That Commission, he might add, differed very little from the council advocated by his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), who seemed to think that if there were only a council to advise the First Commissioner of Works every one would be pleased. It was composed of men who were deemed to be most competent to advise on questions of that description. Among its members were two eminent military engineers—General Jebb and Captain Douglas Galton—a civil engineer, Mr. Maclean—Sir William Cubitt, who was at the time Lord Mayor, Sir John Thwaites, and Mr. Hunt, the Surveyor of Works; so that the Board of Works were, through its Chairman, a party to the original proposal, for although it was true that Sir John Thwaites had not signed the Report, because he objected to one of the recommendations of the Commission, yet he had expressed his entire concurrence in the general scheme suggested. The Report, accompanied by a plan for a roadway, was, among other Papers laid before Parliament, and was in the following year 1862 submitted to a Committee of the House of Commons; so that the whole of the proceedings connected with the matter were as deliberate as possible, and it was rather too late to object to the roadway on the ground that nothing had ever been heard of it before. The road would be very useful, as the only convenient communication between the Strand and the Embankment, and as a relief to the traffic at Charing Cross and the Strand. The higher part of the Viaduct would not be constructed on the Embankment itself, but on the ground which was now occupied by the houses between Cecil Street and Lancaster Place. He might further observe in reply to those who objected to the roadway because it would, in their opinion, occupy a space which was valuable as a site for public buildings, that the original plan for the Thames Embankment was that the greater portion of it should be laid out as a recreation ground for the public, and not used for building purposes. An open space of that kind would be very ornamental. It would be better to let new buildings rise on the space only where old buildings now stand. The building which his right hon. friend (Mr. Layard) proposed to erect would be placed at the bottom of the Adelphi Terrace. He (Mr. W.

Cowper) did not think that would be a favourable place for the erection of such a building. If the Metropolitan Board of Works had objected to this roadway they might have proposed to repeal the clause of the Act relating to it, but he had never heard of a proposal to repeal it. They could not at that moment repeal an Act of Parliament; but a Committee of the House might consider whether this road really involved the objections urged by his noble Friend, or whether the benefit of the communication could be obtained without disfigurement and without needless sacrifice of space.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was of opinion that the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire (Mr. W. F. Cowper) was the clearest illustration they had yet had of the defects of the existing system, and the most complete and clinching confirmation of all the arguments which had been urged by the preceding speakers. The very length of time over which, according to his statement, the arrangements had spread, concluding with the total ignorance which existed as to the ultimate form which they had assumed, was the severest possible condemnation of the entire affair. The right hon. Member had shown that notwithstanding the agencies of the Metropolitan Board of Works and of the First Commissioner of Works, the complicated commissions, notices, forms of the House, and so forth, a Bill had passed through Parliament of which nobody knew anything, and which everybody was startled at when they first happened to hear of it. Now, if such a thing occurred under the present cumbrous management, it proved not only that they were very naughty children indeed, but that they had schoolmasters trained upon very bad models, and that some organization should set to work to alter the whole system. It was really appealing a good deal to their imagination to tell them, as his right hon. Friend had just done, that a temporary Commission had the same power as, or was in any way equivalent to, a formal Council. He admitted that the merits of the proposed Council, on which the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) laid so much stress, were not strictly germane to the present question, and that a great deal might on this point be urged upon the other side. But to contend that a temporary Commission, appointed without any responsibility, and merely to deal with a particular matter, would have the same authority, either in the eyes of Parliament or of the public, as a permanent Board would be to say what few could agree to. The fact was that division of responsibility ended with no responsibility at all in the management of our public buildings. At each change of Government some accomplished gentleman found himself appointed to a Commissionership, which foreign journals translated Ministère des Travaux Publiques, and yet in the greater part of all that concerned the public works of the largest and most important city of the Empire, he had no more authority than the beadle at the Burlington Arcade. The Commissioner had, indeed, a few parks to look after; he might order about a few statues and plant a few flower-beds; and he was the authority whenever a public Department wanted to order a little new furniture. Such was the level of the English idea of Minister of Public Works. He trusted, however, that after the discussion of that evening something better might arise. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) had often raised his voice in the un-Reformed Parliament for a strong Minister of Arts and Architecture. He trusted now that the Reformed Parliament would grasp the conception. He hailed the manly speech of the right hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) and his courageous confession of official impotence; and, in so doing, he claimed that the present First Commissioner should follow up his words with deeds, and propose some effective remedy. After what had taken place, the obnoxious Viaduct was, of course, doomed; but the evening's work would only have been half done if the benefit of the debate were to stop there. He called upon his right hon. Friend to propose some measure which should reorganize and strengthen our administration of public works. And now a few words with regard to the particular question at present before the House. His right hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire had indeed, argued that this Viaduct would go a very short way over the reclaimed land, and would be chiefly carried through the ruinous houses upon the present river's bank. Not long ago, however, he happened accidentally to see what he believed was the authentic plan of the site; and unless his senses deceived him, the major portion of the Viaduct was to run upon the reclaimed land, and it was only to touch existing houses at either end. In short, if the right hon. Gentleman would refresh his memory by looking at the plans he would see that the whole of this portion of the reclaimed land would be hopelessly eaten up by the waste of space incident to the transverse course of the Viaduct. As to the argument that a public building ought not to be placed upon that plot because the land was originally laid out for a park or public recreation ground, that was not to the point of the present debate, and he wondered that the right hon. Member for South Hampshire urged it as if it had been. It might, indeed, be a question hereafter whether a fine public building or a public garden were the more desirable use of the ground. That was a fair matter for a debate. Either would be a noble, and, so to speak, an Imperial destination of that magnificent area, but both would be made impossible if this wretched Viaduct were to be carried out. Let the House clear the way to the discussion by deciding that, in some form or other, the land reclaimed from the river shall be devoted to public purposes, and not be surrendered to private enterprize, and prostituted to wharves and warehouses.

THE CRIMINAL CLASSES.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has seen a statement in the police report, as reported in The Times of the 17th instant, to the following effect:—

“That at the Southwark Police-court a man named George Roberts, aged sixty-five, was charged on remand with being in the area of a certain house for the purpose of committing a felony; that further evidence was given by Richard Kemp, one of the warders at Wandsworth, who said that the prisoner was one of the oldest burglars in England, many years ago he was cast for death, and that sentence was commuted to transportation for life; that he received a ticket of leave, and had since been twice transported for life, and liberated with license; that at the September Sessions of the Central Criminal Court in 1868 witness was present when prisoner was tried for burglary, and sentenced to eighteen months’ hard labour, and that he believed that he had since been convicted in the country. Mr. Burcham sentenced him to three months’ hard labour for being in inclosed premises for an unlawful purpose.”

He wished to know whether that state-

ment as reported represented the facts accurately; whether, if accurate, those facts were in accordance with, or contrary to, the existing state of the Law; and, whether, in either alternative, the right hon. Gentleman has taken, or proposes to take, any steps to remedy such an anomalous and extraordinary state of things? He craved the indulgence of the House for a few moments while he made a few remarks on a subject affecting all classes of society. If the details referred to in this Question were accurately stated, he could hardly imagine that the Home Office Circular issued by Sir George Grey on the 15th of August, 1864, had in this particular case been complied with in every point. He was quite aware that, in making these remarks, he was trenching on the entire subject of the treatment of our criminal population and their alleged rights. He maintained, however, that the rights of society and of peaceable and orderly men must take precedence of the alleged rights of criminals, whose only trade was violence and robbery, and who were at war with all mankind. If any individual came before a magistrate, and, to use the common phrase, “swore the peace” against any other individual, alleging that he went in fear of him, the person against whom the application was made was bound under surety to keep the peace, not only towards the complainant, but towards all Her Majesty’s subjects. Now, if an individual possessed this right as against any other individual, why should society at large be debarred from exercising it collectively against the whole of the criminal class? It might, perhaps, be urged that our prisons were already full to overflowing; but how could it be otherwise while we pursued the present system of transporting none of our criminals, and of hanging very few, who, he was afraid, were in some instances, by no means the worst of them. If we were to turn loose a large number of criminals without an adequate system of supervision, what would become of society? He would not go into the subject more fully at present, because he believed that a Bill was about to be brought forward in reference to it, so that the House would have an opportunity of dealing with the question in a comprehensive and liberal manner. This was a question affecting the whole community, and it ought to be treated without regard to party or political views. He trusted that criminals liberated on ticket of leave would be subjected to supervision, for he could not see that there was any hardship in placing a criminal who had several times offended against the law under the surveillance of the police for the remainder of his life. If the man alluded to in his Question as having been thrice sentenced to transportation for life, had been subjected on his liberation with license to the surveillance of the police, he would not have had an opportunity of committing the fresh offences with which he was charged. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would introduce into any measure he might bring forward stringent clauses to repress the criminal population of this country, as the peaceful and well-disposed members of society were entitled to that protection at the hands of the Government.

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, the very short Notice I received of the hon. Baronet's intention to put his Question prevents me from giving a complete Answer to it. The whole of the case referred to rests solely upon what was said by a warder at Wandsworth, and his statement is so extraordinary that I imagine it will not be found, on inquiry, to have any foundation whatever in truth. The only record at the Home Office, with regard to George Roberts is, that he was convicted of burglary, and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. If hon. Gentlemen consider for a moment, they will see it is in the highest degree improbable that a man sentenced to transportation for life should have been liberated three times during the last fifteen years, for it is only since 1853 that the system of granting licenses, commonly called "tickets of leave," has been in operation. It is, indeed, hardly credible that one sentence of death, and three of imprisonment, had been passed upon a man, and that, in the course of fifteen years, he had received three licenses allowing him to return to this country. I know, as a matter of fact, it is very seldom that a free pardon is granted to persons sentenced for life. Such persons, indeed, occasionally obtain conditional licenses, allowing them freedom within the colony, and no doubt the condition of these licenses is sometimes violated, and the criminals holding them escape to this country. But cases of this kind are very rare, and it is extremely improbable that such a thing should have occurred three times in the case of one person. Inquiry has, however, been instituted into the case mentioned in the hon. Baronet's Question, and on a future occasion I shall be able to supply the correct particulars. Meanwhile, I may remark that, since 1864, very stringent rules have been laid down with regard to the issuing of licenses. Speaking generally, the utmost that a convict can get by way of a remission on a ticket of leave is something less than one-fourth of his sentence, and that remission can only be gained when he has shown great industry and general good conduct. Any departure from industry, or good conduct, leads to a diminution of the extent of the license. In cases of sentences for life, the rule is, that they should be separately considered, and it is only in very extraordinary instances indeed that a pardon is given, enabling a man who has been sentenced to transportation or imprisonment for life to be restored again to society. The hon. Baronet does not seem to be aware that a system of police supervision already exists. It is not so complete as is desirable, owing to the movement of criminals from place to place; but it will be part of the proposals, which I hope to have the honour of submitting to the House on Monday, to make that system of supervision more effectual. With regard to the other measures I am about to bring forward with reference to the amendment of the law in respect of criminals, I am sure the House will not expect me now to anticipate what will so soon be formally submitted to its notice.

ELECTION EXPENSES BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

MR. FAWCETT, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to the Expenses of Returning Officers at Elections, said, the measure had been amply discussed last Session, when there had been four or five divisions upon it. The House and the country would, therefore, be well acquainted with his proposal, which was simply to throw the necessary expenses of elections—and only the necessary expenses—upon the borough or the county rates. Provision had been made in the Bill for cases in which a county was divided, and adequate security would also be provided against unnecessary and vexatious contests. Such a measure would, in his opinion, have this great advantage — it would exert some influence in checking what was no doubt the opprobrium of our representative system—the great, and he feared, the increasing expenses of election contests.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to the Expenses of Returning Officers at Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. FAWCETT, Mr. BAINES, and Mr. M'LAREN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 7.]

DROGHEDA WRIT.

MR. GLYN moved,

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Drogheda, in the room of Benjamin Whitworth, Esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void."

COLONEL TAYLOR said, that only yesterday the House had ordered the production of the evidence taken during the inquiry into the Drogheda Election. He hoped that pending the production of this evidence the issue of the Writ would be suspended.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the Report of the Judges was before the Government. Under the Act of last Session they were of two kinds. They might be mere ordinary Reports that so and so had been duly elected, or that the election was void, in which cases the Writs would issue almost as a matter of course; and there could be no object in having the evidence printed or in instituting inquiry, inasmuch as the decision of the Judge had already settled the matter. Or they might be special Reports, and with regard to them the Act of last Session enacted that where a Judge made a special Report the House of Commons might make such Order as they might think proper with respect to such special Report. Where the Judges reported specially that there was reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, he apprehended that it would generally be proper that an Address to the Crown should be moved for, with a view to the issue of a Commission. The special Report of the Judge in the Drogheda case was not a Report of this kind. At the same time it was, no doubt, a special Report, and the House would be entitled to take such a course as it thought fit. Under these circumstances, he thought there was sufficient ground for asking his hon. Friend to postpone the issue of the Writ for a few days, in order that the House might have before it the evidence taken by the Judge.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

EAST INDIA IRRIGATION AND CANAL COMPANY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. GRANT DUFF, Bill for the confirmation and execution of arrangements made between the Secretary of State in Council of India and the East India Irrigation and Canal Company; and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GRANT DUFF and Mr. STANSFELD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 8.]

COUNTY COURTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. NORWOOD, Bill further to facilitate proceedings in the County Courts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. NORWOOD, Mr. AKROYD, and Mr. MUNDELLA.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 9.]

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

Select Committee appointed, "to whom shall be referred all Petitions presented to the House, with the exception of such as relate to Private Bills; and that such Committee do classify and prepare abstracts of the same, in such form and manner as shall appear to them best suited to convey to the House all requisite information respecting their contents, and do report the same from time to time to the House; and that such Reports do in all cases set forth the number of signatures to each Petition:—And that such Committee have power to direct the printing in extenso of such Petitions, or of such parts of Petitions, as shall appear to require it:—And that such Committee have power to report their opinion and observations thereupon to the House:"—Mr. CHARLES FORSTER, Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Major GAVIN, Mr. HASTINGS RUSSELL, Mr. ALDERMAN SALOMONS, Mr. OWEN STANLEY, Mr. KINNAIRD, Mr. M'LAGAN, Mr. DE GREY, Mr. DIMSDALE, The O'CONOR DON, Mr. WILLIAM ORMSBY GORE, Mr. HENNIKER-MAJOR, Lord GARLIES, and Mr. GUEST:—Three to be the quorum.

House adjourned at half after Six o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 22nd February, 1869.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments and Office of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod appointed.
PUBLIC BILL — First Reading — Parliamentary Proceedings* (7).

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that very soon after the adjournment of the House on Friday he received a communication from Her Majesty's medical adviser, Sir William Jenner, informing him that Prince Leopold had unhappily been attacked by the same disease which on two previous occasions had placed his life in jeopardy. A communication at the same time reached him from Her Majesty, desiring him to express to their Lordships her deep regret at being prevented under those circumstances from receiving at Buckingham Palace their Address and that of the House of Commons. It was, therefore, thought convenient, though somewhat irregular, to apprize their Lordships on Saturday by a Notice appended to their Minutes, that the House would not meet, as had been arranged, to present the Address at noon this day. It was now his duty to move that the Address be presented in the usual manner by the Lords with White Staves.

The Order made on Thursday last, that the Address to Her Majesty, agreed to on Tuesday last, be presented by the Whole House, discharged.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS BILL [H.L.]

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN SHEEP AND CATTLE.—QUESTION.

MR. HEADLAM said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government will take any steps to remove the obstacles that now impede the importation of Foreign Sheep and Cattle? Since he gave Notice of the Question an important change had been made in the regulations affecting the importation of foreign sheep. He would therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman who replied to state precisely the effect of the change, and whether foreign sheep were to be brought into a separate market? The new Order did not affect foreign cattle, and the obstacles to which he alluded were still in existence as regarded them and their reception at separate markets.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could state exactly the effect of the existing regulations with respect to the importation of sheep. The Order in Council which had just been issued revoked an Order in Council which was issued on the 20th of August last year, and the Order of revocation would take effect from Friday next. Consequently, the importation of sheep would be placed in the same position as it was before the Order of August last. The effect of that

Order was that unless sheep arrived in the same vessel as foreign cattle they might be landed at any port where the landing of sheep was now permitted, that was generally at ports of entry; and, if upon examination they were found to be healthy, they might be removed or sold without restriction; but if they were imported in the same vessel with foreign cattle, they were subjected to the same regulations as those which affected foreign cattle. The Order of last August was issued in consequence of the Government being informed that the sheep-pox was at that time raging in Holstein, in Schleswig, and partly in Holland—countries from which we were in the habit of importing sheep. The Government were now informed that sheep-pox was confined within comparatively small bounds in North Germany, had probably disappeared in Holland, and did not exist in any other country from which we usually imported sheep. It was believed to exist to some extent in Italy and Russia; but that was comparatively unimportant, as our imports from those countries were very small. Since the 12th of October, 1868, no case of small-pox had been detected in any foreign sheep coming into this country; and taking that fact into consideration, and also the fact that in Northern Germany the Government regulations were very stringent, and a complete cordon was drawn round the infected districts, and further that the import of sheep into this country had been very much diminished during the operation of these Orders, the Government felt that the restriction could hardly be maintained any longer. From the 1st of September, 1867, up to the second week of February, 175,421 sheep were imported, and from the 1st of September, 1868, to the present date the number imported was only 97,927; and we knew that simultaneously with this reduction of imports the price of mutton had been rising. The Government was satisfied that the danger now was small compared with what it was when the restriction was imposed, and they therefore thought it right to take it off. With regard to the importation of foreign cattle the Government had now had an opportunity of looking at the Bill brought in by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu), because, although it had only just been printed, it was almost a verbatim copy of a Bill which the present Government found in the office. The Government did not feel that they could altogether adopt the arrangements of that Bill, and it was their intention to bring forward a Bill of their own, believing, as they did, that legislation upon the subject was still necessary, and believing also that it was desirable that that legislation should affect animals that might be suffering not merely from the rinderpest, but from other contagious diseases. This was the opinion of many gentlemen connected with the agricultural interests; and the Bill of the Government should be laid on the table before the date fixed for the second reading of the Bill of the noble Lord.

THE MERCANTILE MARINE.

QUESTION.

MR. CANDLISH said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, If he expects to be able this Session to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws affecting our Mercantile Marine?

MR. BRIGHT said, it was the intention of the Board of Trade to introduce such a Bill. The late Government took some steps towards putting the Bill into shape, and it was now in the hands of a draftsman. His hon. Friend knew that the Bill would contain an appalling number of clauses, and that the subject was one of great difficulty. It was therefore the intention of the Board of Trade, when the Bill was sufficiently put into shape, to submit it to a number of gentlemen who were interested in the question, and if possible to make it in some degree complete before it was introduced into the House, and at that time the opinion and advice of the hon. Member would be gladly received. The Bill would be laid on the table of the House in the course of the Session; but he should be sanguine indeed if he were to hope that it could pass this Session.

IRELAND—GRAND JURY LAWS.

QUESTION.

MR. DAWSON said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce during the present Session any measure for revising the Grand Jury Laws of Ireland, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the Report of a Select Committee of this House, which sat during the Session of 1868 on Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland) ?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had prepared a Bill which would substantially carry out the recommendations of the Committee over which his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon had presided. That Bill was in the hands of the draftsman, and if there should appear to be any prospect of passing it in the course of the present Session, he should be most happy to introduce it; but it was impossible that he could as yet give any promise upon the subject.

PARLIAMENT—THE EASTER RECESS. QUESTION.

MR. HARDCASTLE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, On what day it is proposed that the House should adjourn for the Easter Recess, and for what period ?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government had not at present any absolute proposal to make to the House on the subject; but the putting of the Question afforded him an opportunity of stating an arrangement which had occurred to him as calculated to promote the convenience of hon. Members, and he would mention it in order that hon. Gentlemen might make their feelings known. We had this year a concurrence of two circumstances—we had a very late meeting of Parliament and a remarkably early Easter. It therefore occurred to him that it might be convenient to make a sort of exchange between the Easter and Whitsuntide vacations, by shortening the former and fixing the latter early and lengthening it in proportion, so as not to defraud the House on the general result, and to provide for a longer vacation, when hon. Members should have done more to earn it, and at a more congenial season, which would render it more enjoyable. Unless he had reason to suppose that this arrangement would be inconvenient and disagreeable, his impression was that in the course of a week or ten days he should make a proposal for its adoption.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1867—REGISTRATION OF HOUSE- HOLDERS.—QUESTION.

MR. EUSTACE SMITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of

Her Majesty's Government to take any steps towards clearing up the doubts which exist in the minds of many persons, and especially in those of Revising Barristers, as to what constitutes a house within the meaning of the Reform Act of 1867 ?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that when the matter was discussed in the course of the Session of 1867 it was found to be attended with very considerable difficulty, and it might be desirable that some further attempt should be made to clear up the law with respect to it. He had been informed that the records of the proceedings of the Revising Barristers during the last autumn would not afford them much assistance in that direction. That might be owing to the rapidity with which the work of the revision of the lists of voters had then to be conducted, and to the fact that in the course of the revision no point that could be avoided had been dealt with; and under these circumstances he thought it was a matter for consideration whether it would be wise on their parts to attempt to legislate further upon the subject during the present Session, or whether it would not be expedient that they should wait for the experience of the next registration, which would be carried on with the usual amount of deliberation. On the whole, he leaned to the impression—although he did not mean to express any positive and absolute conviction—that it might be expedient for them to postpone dealing with that particular matter until another Session. He was still, however, ready to consider whether a different course should not be adopted, and whether, if the House should determine on making an inquiry into a number of points connected with our Election Law and the system of registration, it might not be desirable to include in the investigation the point which had been raised in the Question of the hon. Gentleman. That was a matter which remained entirely open.

ARMY—THE YEOMANRY CAVALRY. QUESTION.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, If it is the intention of Government to dispense with the services of the Yeomanry Cavalry; if not, whether they are to be called out for permanent duty this year ?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was happy to be able to inform his hon. Friend that the Government had not formed any intention of dispensing with the services of the Yeomanry Cavalry; the usual provision for them would be found in the Estimates about to be presented.

CUBA—IMPRISONMENT OF A BRITISH SUBJECT.—QUESTION.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to the case of Alexander M'Niel, a native of Paisley, who has been confined in a damp prison in Cuba for several months on a charge made by a negro that he had been engaged in casting bullets and making lances for the insurgents, which he denied; and, whether he will take the necessary steps either to have the charge proved or to obtain his release?

MR. OTWAY said, that he had made inquiries on the subject, but he was sorry to say he had received no information as yet. He would communicate with Her Majesty's Consul General at Havannah with respect to it.

IRELAND—PARDON OF FENIAN CONVICTS.—QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to advise Her Majesty that the Royal clemency should be extended to persons suffering imprisonment or penal servitude for offences of a political character in connection with Ireland?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the important subject to which his hon. Friend's Question referred, had met with the anxious attention of the Government. They had felt it their duty to examine most carefully the list of prisoners now undergoing penal servitude on charges of treason and treason-felony, in connection with the Fenian movement. They had examined those lists with a view to ascertain whether, in their judgment, the clemency of the Crown could be extended to any of those persons. The general result of that examination had been this—that among those prisoners there were some who might, with perfect safety to the public peace, be discharged forthwith. The class of prisoners to whom he referred might be described as partly young men, hot-headed men, who were led in an excited moment into criminal acts, for which they were now suffering; men, some of whom might be described as the dupes and tools of others; men incapable, as far as could be ascertained, of doing mischief hereafter as leaders in any future insurrectionary attempts. The number which the Government believed to come under such a description, and whom they thought might safely be discharged, was not inconsiderable. He would tell the House the number exactly as they now stood. Excluding the military convicts, whom the Government held to be in a very different position from the others, and whose cases had not been taken into account—excluding the military convicts, there were eighty-one prisoners under sentence of penal servitude. Of these forty-two were now in Australia and thirty-nine in Great Britain. It was proposed—acting on the rule that he had described, and which had been rigidly applied by a very close scrutiny into the case of each prisoner on the list—it was proposed that of these, forty-nine should be unconditionally discharged. Of these forty-nine there were now thirty-four in Australia and fifteen in Great Britain. That would leave thirty-two prisoners still to undergo their sentence, of whom nine were in Australia and the rest in this country. But he should tell the House that this list of thirty-two prisoners included almost all the main founders, leaders, and organizers of the Fenian movement; it included men who were deeply responsible for the attempted revolution of the last two or three years, and men whom the Government and the Lord Lieutenant felt it would not be consistent with their duty to discharge, or whose freedom would be compatible with the public safety—men, he might add, with regard to whom the Government had no reason to believe that they might not, if discharged, attempt again to renew their unhappy and criminal, although desperate enterprize, and to whom, therefore the Government, while rejoicing as they did, and as Lord Spencer did, that they had been able to reduce the list so largely, felt that the clemency of the Crown should not be extended.

Mr. Neville-Grenville

MR. GATHORNE HARDY asked, whether the prisoners to be liberated in Australia would be left there or brought back to this country at the expense of the Government?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he would prefer answering that Question to-morrow.

THE CONVICT GEORGE ROBERTS.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON repeated the Question he had asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on Friday, as follows:—Whether he has seen a statement in the police report, as reported in The Times of the 17th instant, to the effect—

“That at the Southwark Police Court a man named George Roberts, aged sixty-five, was charged on remand with being in the area of a certain house for the purpose of committing a felony; that further evidence was given by Richard Kemp, one of the warders at Wandsworth, who said that the prisoner was one of the oldest burglars in England, many years ago he was cast for death, and that sentence was commuted to transportation for life; that he received a ticket of leave, and had since been twice transported for life, and liberated with license; that at the September Sessions of the Central Criminal Court in 1866 witness was present when prisoner was tried for burglary, and sentenced to eighteen months’ hard labour, and that he believed that he had since been convicted in the country. Mr. Burcham sentenced him to three months’ hard labour for being in enclosed premises for an unlawful purpose.”

Whether that statement, as reported, represents the facts accurately; whether, if accurate, those facts are in accordance with, or contrary to, the existing state of the Law; and, whether in either alternative he has taken, or proposes to take, any steps to remedy such an anomalous and extraordinary state of things?

MR. BRUCE said, that a few minutes before leaving the Home Office, he received the result of inquiries which had been made into the matter. The statement to which the hon. Baronet referred was not strictly accurate. Although the history of the prisoner was sufficiently eventful, it was not true that he had been sentenced to death, or that he had been twice transported for life, or that he had ever received a ticket of leave. He had been first convicted in 1837, not for burglary but for stealing in a house; and a sentence was passed upon him—which was not unusual at that period—namely, of transportation for life; in 1842 he was found in England under another name, having escaped from the colony, and was again sentenced to transportation for life. He escaped a second time, and was found in England in 1851, again with another name, and sentenced to fourteen years’ transportation. It appeared he had worked out that sentence, because the next record of him at the Home Office was in 1866, when he was convicted and sentenced to be imprisoned for eighteen months for a burglary. Of course, his previous sentences to transportation were not known at this time. Since then he had been twice brought up as a vagrant, and received each time a sentence of a month. It was obvious that upon the last occasion the sentence of fourteen years would have made no difference in his punishment; but the fact that he had escaped was altogether unknown until the statement was made by the warder. The story was a remarkable one; but he was desirous that the House should understand that this man had never received a license, and that his successive escapes were due to himself and his own merits, and not to the neglect of the Home Office.

THE CONVICT RICHARD BONNER.

QUESTION.

MR. WALTER inquired of the Home Secretary, What answer he had made to a memorial forwarded to him from the Justices of Berkshire containing the following curious statement:—

“That in the year 1831 one Richard Bonner was tried and convicted at Oxford, and sentenced to fourteen years’ transportation; that at the Oxford Lent Assizes, in the year 1851, the said Richard Bonner was tried and convicted of highway robbery, and sentenced to transportation for life; that, in 1863, the same Richard Bonner was convicted at the borough of Reading, and sentenced to two years’ imprisonment; that, at the expiration of such last-mentioned term of imprisonment, the said Richard Bonner, having been previously officially reported as a license holder, was sent back to Millbank Prison, but, notwithstanding this, he was again (in 1868) convicted of crime in this county, and sentenced to six months’ imprisonment, and again, at the expiration of that term, sent back to Millbank Prison. Your memorialists submit, that, independently of the social aspects of the case, it is a hardship upon the county of Berks that the convict in question should have been a burden upon it for the space of two years and six months after he had been sentenced to transportation for life as above set forth?”

MR. BRUCE said, he would read the answer he had forwarded to the memorial; it was as follows:—

“The burden of maintaining a license-holding convict during his term of imprisonment for an offence committed while he is at large is imposed by the existing law upon the county in which his conviction took place. Unless sentences for life are to be absolutely, and under all circumstances, irremissible, the hardship of which the Justices complain must occasionally occur. Previously to 1864 the punishment of transportation or penal servitude for life was inflicted more frequently than at present, and the liberation of life-convicts on licenses, after twelve years' imprisonment, was not unusual. Since 1864 the sentences of life imprisonment have only been passed in the gravest cases, and by a regulation made by Sir George Grey in 1866 the minimum time at which each case could be considered, except under special circumstances, was twenty years. Each case would then be considered on its own merits. The case of Richard Bonner suggests a reasonable doubt whether a convict for life who while at large on license commits a fresh offence, thereby proving that he is unreclaimed and irreclaimable, ought ever to receive a second license.”

It was worthy consideration whether where a man on ticket of leave had been convicted of a subsequent offence it ought not to be in the power of the Judge to re-commit him at once to Millbank, or one of the Government convict prisons. But, as the public interest was very much alive to this subject, it might be well to explain why he considered that there might be special circumstances under which a person sentenced for life might have his sentence occasionally revised. A case which had occurred within the last few days would illustrate some of the difficulties under which a Home Secretary was placed. On the same day a petition reached him praying for remission of part of the sentence in the case of two persons who had been convicted for precisely the same offence, which was an attempt to murder. The attempt was deliberate, and in each case there was a narrow escape. The offenders were persons not previously criminal, but were moved to this violent action by jealousy. They were tried by different Judges, and one man, who had attempted to murder his wife, received a sentence of penal servitude for twenty years; the other, who had attempted to murder a man of whom he was jealous, was sentenced to imprisonment for life. With respect to the person who had been sentenced to twenty years, in the ordinary course of events, he would receive a license after fifteen years and four months, provided his conduct had been good. But, if that were so, it was quite clear that the other person, who had been committed for life for a similar offence, ought to have his case considered. It was obvious, therefore, that there must occasionally be circumstances which would induce a man of upright feeling, in the position which he had the honour to hold, to remit some portion of a sentence for life.

CRIME PREVENTION BILL.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BRUCE said, he wished to take that opportunity of stating that it was not his intention to proceed that evening with the Bill which he had given Notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce. Her Majesty's Government had taken into consideration the representations which had been made in both Houses with regard to a division of labour, and it had been thought most convenient that this Bill should be introduced into the House of Lords, where his noble Friend (the Lord Privy Seal) would, in the course of a day or two, bring it in.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, some days ago this House determined to avail itself of an opportunity of testifying its loyalty and affection to the Throne by unanimously passing a Motion that the Address in answer to the gracious Speech from the Throne should be presented to the Sovereign by the Whole House. But on Friday evening I received a communication from Her Majesty at Osborne, in which Her Majesty expressed her deep concern—in truth, she used a stronger expression—that the serious—indeed, the alarming—illness of His Royal Highness Prince Leopold rendered it impossible for her to quit him, and placed it out of her power to name any period when she could receive the Addresses of this and the other House of Parliament. I, at the same time, received a communication from Sir William Jenner, that the complaint under which His Royal Highness was labouring was the same as that which, on one or two former occasions, had placed the life of His Royal Highness in extreme jeopardy. This illness, Dr. Jenner explained, was such, that it was impossible to predict what course it would take; and, as the medical adviser of Her Majesty, he could not recommend that any plans could be then formed for Her Majesty's quitting Osborne, nor could he name a time when such plans could, with confidence, be entertained. Sir, under these circumstances, I felt it my duty to make a communication to the House, and I came down for the purpose; but, unfortunately, I believe the House had within five minutes before closed its Business and adjourned. These communications were followed on Saturday by others to the same purport, stating that, though all things were going on favourably, yet the matter being a critical one, and circumstances remaining the same, it was impossible for Her Majesty to name a day for the purpose of receiving the Address, and in consequence she was obliged to abandon the hope she had entertained of receiving it in person. Under these circumstances, it is my duty to move that the Order which was made by this House on a former day be discharged, with a view to the Address being presented in the manner which is usual in reply to a Speech delivered by Commission.

Motion agreed to.

POLITICAL PENSIONS FOR CIVIL OFFICES.—RESOLUTION.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I rise to propose a Resolution for leave to bring in a Bill to amend and extend the provisions of certain Acts relating to what are commonly known as political pensions, and the object of this Motion particularly is to bring under the consideration of this House certain alterations which we think might with advantage be made in the Act by which political pensions are regulated—an Act passed in 1834. Before that period the subject of political pensions was one which caused much difficulty and dissatisfaction. There was no rule applicable to them, and transactions of an irregular character, and which were not governed by any law or system, were continually occurring. The period of the Government of Earl Grey was probably among the very best in our history so far as regards the mature consideration which was then given to administrative questions and the amount of sagacity which was brought to bear on them, and the Act of 1834, which laid the foundation both of a superannuation system and of a method for the regulation of political pensions may, I think, deservedly be regarded as an Act of high authority. But, of course, with the changes of circumstances, it will naturally occur that a measure of that kind is found in process of time to require amendment, and Parliament has thought it wise upon a later occasion to develop and otherwise to alter this portion of the Act which relates to pensions affecting what is commonly called the permanent Civil Service, for the sake of distinction from that portion of the Civil Service which is political. I now propose, after the experience of thirty-five years, certain changes in those clauses of the Act which relate to political pensions. Thirty-five years is, indeed, no short period for the consideration of such an Act, and the alterations of our arrangements which have occurred in that period—I mean our arrangements with reference to the organization of the Government—have been very considerable. There are two points to which the alterations I propose will apply. In the first place, there is in the Act of 1834 a certain mixture of non-political with political pensions. The second Secretary to the Admiralty, and all the Under Secretaries of State, whether political or non-political, are placed on one and the same footing as to pensions, and difficulties have arisen in certain cases in the administration of the Act with respect to some officers of that class which it is manifestly desirable to obviate for the future. With respect to the system of pensions established by the Act, the House may be aware that it is peculiar in many respects; but when I so describe it, I do not mean on that account in the slightest degree to disparage the provisions of the Act. The Act, however, takes a view essentially different—and in that respect I think it is quite justified—of the position in regard to pension of the political officer and of the civil officer who is not political. The civil officer who is not a political officer is presumed, after his term of service (subject to the conditions of the Act, and on the supposition of his good conduct) to have a right to a pension. The political officer however is not presumed by the Act to have anything that can be called a right to a pension. The political pensions which are contemplated by the Act appear to have been intended by the Legislature to prevent the public inconvenience which might arise from the discouragement of men of capacity, but not of great fortune, from engaging in the public service if this were to happen, that those who had been called to fill certain stations, and to hold a certain social rank as servants of the Crown, were, after filling those offices with the various responsibilities attached to them, and possibly after conferring great services on the country, to be left in such a condition, by no fault of their own, but it may be in consequence of their own self-denial in devoting themselves to the public service, that they might be destitute of adequate means for supporting their social station. For this purpose the provisions of the Act were framed, and on this principle. In the first place, there was a limitation of the amounts of pension which might be given by the Act, according to the ranks of the offices to which they referred. In the second place, there was a limitation of the number of years during which any person must have served in order to qualify and obtain eligibility for pension. In the third place, there was an absolute limitation on the number of pensions which might be granted and might be in force at any one given period in the different classes established by the Act. In the fourth place, there was a limitation, which was likewise absolute, that no political officer could take a pension under the Act except after having made a declaration to the effect that it was necessary with a view to that reasonable support of station which the Act contemplated as desirable. And, in the last place, there was this condition, that the pension, subject to all those prior stipulations, should be granted at the discretion and upon the responsibility of the Executive Government of the day. As respects these conditions, I do not propose to alter the root or basis of any one of them. There might, I think, be some modification in a portion of them, which would tend, however, rather to the reduction than to the augmentation of the number of pensions contemplated by the Act. The bearing of those conditions upon one another, numerous as they are, constitutes a subject that is rather complex, on which it will not, I think, be possible for the Committee or the House to form a judgment until a Bill is printed and placed in their hands. But the main reason for an alteration of that portion of the Act which refers to political offices is this, that it is quite evident that, in the intention of the Legislature, the Act was meant to apply, upon an equable principle, to all offices and all political officers who stood substantially in the same position. Now, since the Act was passed, the changes have been so numerous that that object is no longer gained. Many offices which then existed now exist no longer, and many which now exist have been brought into existence since the passing of the Act, and consequently do not fall within its provisions; and the main rectification which I propose to attain by the Bill I shall ask leave to bring in is, while we strike out of the Act those offices which no longer exist, and which were placed into it at a former period with reference to the circumstances then existing, that there shall be introduced into the Act other offices which did not then exist, and possibly also in some cases one or two offices which did then exist, but which, on account of some special considerations perhaps not well understood, were not included in the Act, so that the candidates for those offices—the list of possible candidates for them—will undergo some change while the conditions of obtaining pensions will, in the main, remain the same, although in certain points it may be desirable to modify them. Now, this is a subject with regard to which it is the duty of the Executive Government, having, as they have, a knowledge of the administrative departments of the country and their relations, frankly to lay their views before the House at a period when they think the time is suitable for legislation and that an adequate necessity for it has arisen. Therefore, instead of merely asking the House itself to examine the question, I shall propose to place before it the changes which the Government think might reasonably and properly be made. Nor do I think that the House will find that there is any reason to object to the spirit in which those changes have been conceived. But while I hold that the Executive Government ought not to shrink from its ordinary and proper responsibility in submitting its views on this matter to the House, I must say, on the other hand, that on this question of all others it would be most repugnant to the intentions and opinions of the Government that anything like pressure or authority should be brought to bear by them for the purpose of inducing the acceptance of those views by the House. Every question in one sense, but especially questions relating to pensions and superannuation, and most of all questions relating to pensions available for those who have served in political offices, ought to be determined by the independent and impartial judgment of the House itself. Therefore, we shall in the first instance invite the scrutiny of the House into our views by laying this Bill—if I am permitted to make the Motion—on the table; in the second place, I shall take care that ample time is afforded for its consideration by the House before the House is called upon to give any sanction to its principle by a second reading. And when the second reading shall have been passed—if the Bill so far meets the approval of the House—we shall be desirous to invite the concurrence of the House in any mode of considering its provisions in detail which may be suggested or may appear to be generally convenient. I think, Sir, that these remarks are all that are necessary to introduce the Resolution which I am about to move. The Resolution has been drawn up in terms formally and technically correct, and begins with the words “That it is expedient to amend and extend the provisions” of certain Acts; but after what I have said, the House will understand that it is for technical reasons that the word “extend” is contemplated, rather than because we in any way intend or endeavour to render eligibility for political pensions more easy of access. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by accordingly moving a Resolution declaring it expedient to amend and extend the provisions of the Acts in question.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend and extend the provisions of the Acts 57 Geo. 3, c. 65, and 6 Geo. 4, c. 90, enabling Her Majesty to recompense the Services of persons holding, or who have held, certain high and efficient Civil Offices, and of the Act 4 and 5 Will. 4, c. 24, regulating Pensions, Compensations, and Allowances to persons having held Civil Offices in Her Majesty's Service.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

RATEABLE PROPERTY (METROPOLIS) BILL.—LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. GOSCHEN, in rising to move for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for uniformity in the Assessment of Rateable Property in the Metropolis, said, he thought there was no Member of that House who would not approve the general scope and object of the Bill, which provided that where there was a common charge there should be a uniform assessment co-extensive with the area of that charge. Now there were in London a large number of different rates assessed over the whole metropolis, and no one would dispute the advantage of having a uniform assessment over the whole of that area. But there were also other improvements which he hoped would be effected by the Bill. Hon. Gentlemen were doubtless aware that the Union Assessment Committee Act of 1862 applied only to unions, and that the separate parishes in the metropolis, existing side by side with those unions, were not affected by it, and consequently did not enjoy the advantages conferred by that Act, which was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers). It was proposed by the present Bill to direct the twenty-two separate metropolitan parishes to establish Union Assessment Committees, so that the first effect of the measure would be to put those parishes on the same footing with the seventeen unions. There was, however, a further object which he hoped would be accomplished by the Bill. At present a number of rates were levied in the metropolis on separate bases. These were the police rate, the poor rate, the county rate, the rate for the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the rate for the new Metropolitan Asylums Board. The Bill proposed to place all these rates on a uniform footing, and, if possible, to establish one basis for local and Imperial taxation in the metropolis. In fact, the object was the same as that which the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Hunt) aimed at in his Bill as applying to the country at large, though the metropolis was exempted from the operation of that measure. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman did not pass into law in consequence, he believed, of its having been introduced at a late period of the Session; but it was subjected to the scrutiny of a very able Committee, and much improved by the process. That Bill contained another valuable provision with regard to the definition of gross estimated rental. Great confusion arose from the various methods in which the rental was made up by different union assessment committees and by the separate parishes in the metropolis. Not only was there the greatest variety with regard to the deductions allowed, but also with regard to the manner in which they arrived at gross estimated rental. Consequently a great grievance was inflicted upon certain classes of occupiers, such as weekly tenants, for instance. In some unions the gross estimated rental was the aggregate amount of the weekly rents, while others contended that this was contrary to the law, which directed that the fair annual value of the house should be taken. This state of things might, in his opinion, be remedied by introducing a better definition of gross estimated rental in the present Bill, which, he might remark, contained no new principle whatever, but merely sought to carry out the principle of the Union Assessment Committee Act, that, where there was a common charge, common valuation lists must be established on the same basis; and the Valuation of Property Bill of 1867, which through the pressure of business did not pass, was really the foundation of the present measure. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) introduced his Metropolitan Poor Bill of 1867, of which they heard so much in London at present, he stated his views very clearly with regard to the necessity of having a common valuation of property in the metropolis. On the second reading of the Bill the right hon. Gentleman remarked—

“Great stress has been laid on the evils which will result from placing those charges on the Common Fund, owing to there being no system of uniform valuation in the metropolis. I feel that point, and consequently I have endeavoured to meet the difficulty by Clause 62—

“‘The Poor Law Board shall from time to time assess on the several unions and parishes in the metropolis the amounts of their respective contributions to the Common Poor Fund in proportion to the annual rateable value of the property therein comprised, to be determined according to the valuation lists, or, where there are none, according to the latest poor rate for the time being for the union or parish, or otherwise, as the Poor Law Board from time to time direct.’

“It is quite true that we do not always know on what system a union or parish is assessed for Poor Law purposes; but the assessments for the Metropolitan Board and for the police rate we know are on the best available basis; and the Poor Law Board, in making an assessment, will be able to do as is done in counties. Though the assessments in the various unions of a county may be on different systems, the counties levy a rate on their own assessment, which is made on a uniform system throughout the whole county. So far, therefore, as it can be done, we have endeavoured to meet that objection by a clause in the Bill; but I propose to do more. My hon. Friend the Secretary for the Treasury (Mr. Hunt) has brought in a Bill to provide a uniform scheme of assessment for the whole country, with the exception of the metropolis. I will wait to see what is done with that Bill; but I have sketched a Bill for the metropolis, which I propose to introduce if my hon. Friend's should receive the sanction of Parliament.”—[8 Hansard, clxxxv. 779.]

That Bill did not, however, receive the sanction of Parliament, because there was not sufficient time to pass it that Session, but he might say that the House generally accepted the principle that it was necessary to establish uniformity of assessment. The only question which could arise was whether it was expedient to proceed to deal at once with this particular part of the machinery of local taxation—a machinery which in many other parts required to be altered. No doubt the whole system of our local taxation was full of every kind of complexity and difficulty, but still he thought this particular part was one which might be dealt with separately. It was indeed a matter of urgency, and he therefore trusted the House would pass the Bill as quickly as possible if he could show, as he believed he could, that considerable hardship and injustice were at the present moment arising from the want of such provisions as were contained in the Bill which he asked for leave to introduce. With regard to the country generally, the principal, though not the only, rate which extended over the whole county was the county rate. But that was not the case in the metropolis. They had in the metropolis a number of different charges. There were the police charges, the Metropolitan Board of Works rate, and the new rate imposed by the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University. It was probable that additional charges would be put on the metropolis, and he thought the House would be in favour of distributing the burdens imposed on the metropolis over large instead of small areas. The Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman opposite was most valuable in this respect. That measure had been very much criticized, but he hoped to take an opportunity before very long of telling the House what had been done under it, of correcting some exaggerated statements which had been made as to the expense incurred, and of satisfying the ratepayers in the metropolis generally that the burdens imposed upon them would not be so great as some of them anticipated. It was obvious that there must be a further progress towards the equalization of the rates, and he scarcely thought the House would consent to the equalization of rates unless some machinery were devised to control the local management of a portion of the general expenditure, by which he did not mean Imperial expenditure, but the more central metropolitan expenditure as compared with the expenditure in separate parishes. The common charges in the metropolis were on the increase. Taken roughly, there was the police rate of about 6*d.* in the pound, the county rate of 4*d.* in the pound, the Metropolitan Board of Works rate from 6*d.* to 7*d.* in the pound, and the rate for the Common Fund, which is about 5*d.* in the pound. These items together amounted to about 1*s.* 10*d.*; and if they reached 1*s.* 11*d.* they would represent a sum of £1,500,000. Nearly that sum was now raised over the whole area of the metropolis, but the present system of raising the money was full of anomalies, injustice, and inequalities. These rates were raised according to different principles. The two leading rates were the county rate and the poor rate. Until a week or two ago there had been no revision of the county rate in Middlesex since 1864, and, generally speaking, the rate was not revised more frequently than once in five years. And here he wished to point out that, on the basis of the county rate as settled in 1864, various new charges had been imposed on the unions and separate parishes in the metropolis. The Metropolitan Board of Works levied its rate according to the county rate basis. The police rate, too, was levied on the same basis, and it was another anomaly that it was collected with the poor rate. The new rate for the Common Fund of the metropolis, on the other hand, was levied on the basis of the poor rate; and there being no equality between the two, it resulted that if the county rate were adopted as a basis injustice would be done to a certain number of unions, while other unions would suffer if the poor rate principle were adopted. He would mention one or two instances which showed the utter want of system in regard to these rates. In the first place, it must be remembered that the metropolis was subject to four jurisdictions in reference to the county rate—namely, Middlesex, Kent, Surrey, and the City of London. In these jurisdictions the county rate was made by different bodies and on different principles, though it nevertheless formed the basis of what might be termed the common operations of the metropolis. Take the case of Poplar, for example. There the valuation list for the poor rate was £473,000. The valuation for the county rate was £344,000, and if that valuation was too low, Poplar was not paying its fair share towards the expenses of the Metropolitan Board of Works. If, on the contrary, the valuation for the poor rate was too high, it was charged more than its fair share towards the common relief of distress. The fact was that there were different Boards, levying rates on different principles, and the consequence was that the valuations did not agree. In Middlesex there were eight unions, and the county rate valuation which had been in force until very recently was £2,600,000, while the poor rate valuation was £2,900,000. In the four Surrey Unions the county rate was £889,000, the poor rate valuation £944,000. The revision of the county rate, however, which had just been made had effected a great difference, because the county rate, instead of being £500,000 below the poor rate, had become higher by £500,000 or more. He thought he had said enough to show that the whole system of rating, so far as valuation was concerned, was in a state of great confusion, and for that state of things he saw no remedy except to establish uniformity of assessment among all the unions, and for all the various rates that had to be raised. In establishing that uniformity in a case where so large a number of local authorities existed as were at present to be found in the metropolis there were no doubt considerable difficulties to be encountered, but with the assistance of the House he hoped those difficulties might be overcome. Another grievance under which many unions laboured, independent of their being taxed upon an erroneous basis, was that loans were contracted on the security of the rateable value of the property in separate parishes, and the instalments payable for thirty years to come placed upon a faulty foundation. The instalment did not shift with the rateable value, but was fixed, and the consequence was that loud remonstrances were made against permitting such a state of things to continue. Most of the deputations which had waited on the Poor Law Board on the subject were from the poorer parishes, where it had been found necessary to screw up the valuation to the highest possible point. In parishes like St. George's, Hanover Square, no temptation to do that existed. The temptation, if any, was, on the contrary, the other way, because the lower the inhabitants were assessed in comparison with their neighbours, the higher would the rate in the pound appear which they would have to pay. A revision of the assessment in the parish of St. George was, he believed, in progress at the present moment. It had been stated in electoral and other returns that the usual difference there between gross estimated rental and rateable value was 10 per cent; but any hon. Member who lived in the parish must, he thought, be aware that the difference between the actual rent paid and the assessment to the relief of the poor was something very unlike 10 per cent. He knew a house in the parish of St. George which was assessed at £600 for the house duty, and not higher than £370 for the county and poor rates. The system of assessment being thus faulty, it would, he felt assured, be admitted that a case for immediate legislation on the subject had been made out. The simpler the organization, and the fewer the novelties introduced with a view to provide a remedy, in his opinion, the better. He had been informed that if valuation lists for the entire metropolis were to be made out de novo, five years at least must elapse before they could be completed. So long a delay was, in his opinion, very undesirable. The principle on which he desired to proceed was to secure uniformity of assessment, and that was to be done by two, or he might say by three means. In the first place, he would give all the unions a locus standi among themselves, so that one union might be able to appeal against the valuation of another. That was the principle of the valuation of property which had been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford in 1867, and it seemed to him to be the proper principle on which to proceed. But, before the unions were brought together as he proposed, assessment committees must be established in those separate parishes in which none now existed, the number of which was twenty-two. One of the advantages of these parishes having regular assessment committees would be that the ratepayers in those parishes would be placed on the same footing as the unions, and would be afforded an opportunity of inspecting the valuation lists, which would be deposited in certain places. That would be quite independent of the general advantage of bringing the unions together. It was, he might add, astonishing to find to what an extent separate parishes had been able to exempt themselves from the operation of the general law. There were a large number of local Acts which stood in the way at every step. The Poor Law Amendment Act of 1844 contained a special exemption of parishes with a population of over 20,000 from its operation, unless with the consent of two-thirds of the guardians, and the rights of separate parishes were reserved as regarded the relief of the poor. Those parishes, of course, escaped the operation of the Union Assessment Act, because they were not unions, but they came to a certain extent within the scope of the general law under the Bill of 1867, which empowered the Poor Law Board to amalgamate them together. They still however remained excluded from the operation of the general law so far as the levying their own rates and the making their own assessments were concerned; but he thought that could be no possible objection to the establishment of union assessment committees in these parishes, such as existed in all the unions. The next thing to be done after the establishment of separate assessment committees was to bring them together for the purpose of uniform assessment. What he should propose, then, in the first place, was to have representatives from the assessment committees, who should be able to meet together to decide on a common basis of action in regard to valuation, subject to the regulations laid down in the Bill. There had been various proposals with reference to an Assessment Board for the metropolis. It had been proposed that the Metropolitan Board of Works should be appointed an Assessment Board; that the Central Sick Asylum Board should be appointed; and that the justices should form the Assessment Board. It appeared to him far better to follow the general line of the Valuation of Property Bill—that each union assessment committee should elect its own representative; and thus to carry out as between unions the principle that had already been carried out as between parishes. In this way they would obtain a Central Assessment Board for the metropolis. He proposed that a scale of deductions should be inserted in the Bill, because he thought that such a scale was necessary if they were to arrive at anything like uniformity of assessment. At present the deductions in some unions were from 20 to 30 per cent, while in others, without any apparent cause for the difference, they amounted to only 10 per cent. The Government had given considerable attention to the question, whether it was possible to lay down anything like a general system of deductions, and they had arrived at the conclusion that by naming a maximum amount of deductions and giving the unions a discretionary power below that maximum, it was possible to do so in a satisfactory manner. That principle would be acted on in this Bill. As to appeals by one union against the assessment made by another, he thought that if the appeal were to the Central Board it would be necessary to give an appeal from that Board itself, because it would be composed of interested parties. A multiplicity of appeals would lead to complication, and he was of opinion, therefore, that it would be more desirable that the Central Board should have a paid assessor, who would act as judge in appeals from one union against another. He hoped that the valuation which would be made under the new system would be the basis, not only of the poor rate but of the taxation levied by the Metropolitan Board of Works, the house tax, and, in fact, of all other taxes. It would be necessary to give the surveyor of the taxes and the Metropolitan Board of Works power to appeal against the assessment made by a union. Each union would make its own assessment, as at present, and would be required to revise its valuations at stated periods; but each union would have power to make an appeal against the total of the assessment of any other union. The power of appeal by one union against another would only be as regarded the totals. He believed that the effect of giving this power of appeal would be to insure great uniformity without a resort to the process of appeal being actually had recourse to in any considerable number of cases. When it was laid down that the surveyor of taxes would have a right to appeal against the valuation of any hereditament, and that the several unions would have the power of appeal to which he had just alluded, each union would be interested in bringing the valuation up to a proper figure. When the Bill was laid upon the table the House would be better able to judge of the machinery by which, it was hoped, uniformity of assessment would be secured. He wished to say one word as to gross estimated rental in connection with weekly tenants. Those tenants represented that in many instances they were suffering a great grievance in consequence of the present want of system. Memorials had been presented on the subject, and it had been suggested that a case should be brought in a Court of Law. Hon. Members might have seen from the report of proceedings in connection with Sir Sydney Waterlow's association for improving the dwellings of the industrial poor, that the way in which an Assessment Board had acted was to look at one block of buildings, the apartments in which were let at various weekly amounts, reckon up all these several sums, multiply the aggregate number of shillings by fifty-two, and say that the sum thus obtained was the gross estimated rental of the block. It was stated that, owing to valuations being made in that way, and to the abolition of the compound householders, the rateable value of weekly tenements had been raised by no less than 40 per cent. The difference in respect of value between weekly tenements and yearly ones was so clear that it was, he thought, possible to lay down some definition so as to avoid the hardship to which he alluded. Owing to the arbitrary proceedings of the assessment committees, and the difficulty of appealing, it was not easy for weekly tenants to obtain justice in this respect. He was glad that the increase of taxation in the metropolis was now engaging so much public attention, because this attention would lead to a more rigid supervision of the outlay. With a view to justice and economy in that taxation, he now asked the House to agree to his Motion that leave be given him to bring in a Bill to provide for uniformity in the Assessment of Rateable Property in the Metropolis.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board was correct in stating that it had been his intention, when at the Poor Law Board, to propose a measure having for its object what, of course, was the object of the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman now asked leave to introduce. In fact, it must have been the intention of those who placed on the metropolis the charges imposed by the Bill brought in by the late Government, that those charges should be raised on a uniform basis. It was quite clear that the principle of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill was a just one, and any question that might arise must be as to the framing of the Bill. He could not give any positive opinion on its details till he saw them in print; but it appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to follow the plan of the Bill brought in by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) the year before last. It appeared to him that the great thing at the outset was to obtain suitable bodies to lay down the basis of rating. He would observe that in a Board made up of representatives of the same parish there would not probably be mutual check and supervision to the same extent as there existed in a Union Board made up of representatives from several parishes; but the presence at the Central Board of the representatives of the surveyor of taxes, and other authorities besides the unions, might perhaps afford a security that the valuation in the various unions would be brought up to the proper amount. It was very desirable that there should be uniformity of assessment in the metropolis. The question of metropolitan taxation was a very serious one; and no doubt it would have to engage the attention of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department when next year, as he proposed, he should set about providing a new Government for the metropolis. As in a Bill such as that now proposed everything depended on details, he thought it would be more advisable not to discuss it until after it had been printed and placed in the hands of Members. In its principle it should have his hearty support.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he was of opinion that the inhabitants of the metropolis were greatly indebted to the President of the Poor Law Board for introducing the measure under discussion at this early period of the Session. He was glad to find that there was a prospect that they would now obtain a uniform and equitable assessment. The present system, under which different parishes had different modes of assessment, resulted in great injustice. He thought that a common basis should be formed upon which every tax, whether for local or Imperial purposes, should be levied, and that the system of assessing quotas on the parishes by the unions for poor rates, by the counties for county rates, and on the various districts of the metropolis by the Metropolitan Board of Works for drainage, &c., ought to be abolished, as it involved great inequality of taxation. He considered that the time had arrived when the exemption from taxation enjoyed by certain favoured districts—such, for instance, as the Temple, and the other Inns of Court—should be abolished.

MR. BRODRICK, on behalf of the large constituency (Mid Surrey) affected by the measure, as within the metropolitan area, which he represented, tendered his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for introducing this Bill at the commencement of the Session. The measure was the legitimate corollary of that introduced, but from various circumstances not carried to a successful conclusion, by the late Government. In many of the parishes immediately adjoining those within the metropolis were to be found great numbers of the working hands of the metropolis, and with scarcely an exception no large landed proprietors or householders. The result was that the very serious burdens already borne by those parishes were daily increasing. Nothing could be more anomalous than that while in some of those parishes, especially in the southern districts, the valuation upon which they were assessed for the metropolitan rates amounted to the full value of the rack rental, in the most wealthy metropolitan parishes, such as St. George's, Hanover Square, that valuation did not, in many instances, exceed 50 per cent of the amount of the rack rental; so that even the low rating in this last parish formed no adequate measure of the difference of burden as between it and less wealthy parishes. Looking to these facts, no doubt could be entertained that sooner or later a uniform system of rating must be adopted. It was just a moot point whether it might not ultimately be desirable to adopt the contributory principle, which had been found to work so admirably at the time of the Lancashire distress. The adoption of such a principle would not in any way prevent a uniform basis for taxation being agreed upon. Should the right hon. Gentleman succeed in carrying the present measure to a successful conclusion, much more good would flow from it than he ventured to anticipate would result from several other measures which had taken a far more prominent position in the Government programme.

MR. LOCKE said, he had been unable to ascertain from the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman whether it was proposed that a fresh valuation should be made for rating purposes. As such a valuation would be attended with great expense, many parishes might be unwilling to agree to such a proposal. This was a very important question; because he did not see how the various proposals contained in the Bill were to be carried out, unless each parish were accurately valued. At the present time, when a parish was rated by itself, it did not much matter whether the valuation was correct or not, as the worst that could result from an inaccurate valuation was that a ratepayer might have to appeal against the rate. When, however, all the parishes came to be rated together it would be highly important that they should be fully valued in order to secure a fair distribution of the burden of the rates. He did not know exactly what were the views of the right hon. Gentleman upon the subject, but in his opinion the most important question connected with the rating of the metropolis was that of the equalization of the poor rate. They all knew that a most inadequate amount was levied in the rich parishes in comparison with the poor ones; and this difference was much aggravated by the fact that in the poor parishes they paid upon a much higher valuation than they did in the rich ones. The rich parishes created many of the poor, and they were driven out of their bounds into the poorer parishes. He sincerely trusted that the right hon. Gentleman was not going to content himself with the measure now before the House, but would go a step further, and bring in a Bill for the equalization of these rates.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he hoped that there would be no delay in passing the measure, so that they might consider the more important question which had been mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke). He did not, however, himself think that the Government would be in a position to deal with that question until the present measure had been in operation for some few years. The first thing to be considered was the actual incidence and pressure of local taxation, which at present no one knew; and it was marvellous that they should so long have gone on increasing these burdens without taking care that they were placed on an equitable basis as between the various parishes. As the representative of three very large parishes in London he thanked his right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) for bringing in this measure, which he believed would be carried with acclamation from both sides of the House. When the measure passed into law, its operation would doubtless furnish materials for such an argument as that to which his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Locke) was anxious to give effect, but at present it would be wholly premature to discuss that matter.

MR. BREWER said, he wished to point out, as a matter of fairness to the parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, that within the last few months the parish had been entirely re-assessed by an assessor who was independent of the local authorities, and who had been furnished with a copy of Schedule A of the income tax. The argument based upon a state of things formerly existing, was inapplicable and somewhat unjust to that parish in the present day; and although it might be an isolated parish, its contributions to the general fund for the police and Board of Works were raised on the county and not the poor rate. The parish had not had any great anxiety for re-adjustment since the introduction of the Bill of 1867.

MR. SAMUDA said, that in some parishes it was customary to rate only the buildings, while in others the plant and machinery which the buildings contained were rated as well. Great doubt existed at the present moment as to what was really the law upon the point; but if the principle of rating machinery, &c., were generally adopted, it would have the effect of raising the rating in many cases upwards of 50 per cent. Such an increase, at a time of great commercial depression, could not fail to produce results of a serious character.

MR. MELLOR said, that as the representative of a manufacturing district, and with the experience gained by acting as Chairman of the Assessment Committee at Ashton-under-Lyne, he begged to assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) that if he would determine what constituted "annual value" he would settle a point always felt to be one of very great difficulty.

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that those parishes which could show that they were at present fully assessed, would not be under the obligation of making an entirely fresh valuation. When the valuation lists had been made out by the different parishes and sent in, the totals of those lists would be dealt with by the Central Board. That Board would have nothing to do with the tenement valuation, but simply with the totals; if any parish, however had conducted its operation so as to reduce its valuation below the proper amount, facilities would be afforded for an appeal. A distinction had been very properly drawn between the equalization of rates and the equalization of assessments. He had always been in favour of equalizing, as far as possible the burdens of different parts of the metropolis; and he fully endorsed the spirit of the observations made by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Locke). But he maintained that it was impossible to move faster towards the equalization of rates than was allowed by the discovery of the machinery requisite to insure that no abuse would arise from giving to local bodies a claim upon funds not locally raised. The movement made in the direction of equalization in the Act carried by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) must not be underrated. It was true that the poor rate was much greater individually than the other rates; but the other rates raised over the whole metropolis amounted to an aggregate of 2s. in the pound, out of an aggregate of 5s. in the pound representing the taxation of the metropolis as a whole; consequently nearly one-half of the metropolitan taxation was borne by the common area of the metropolis. Further progress, carefully made, would doubtless tend in the same direction; and the question of equalization of rates would certainly receive, as it deserved, the consideration of the Government. Regarding St. George's, Hanover Square, to which the hon. Member for Colchester (Dr. Brewer) had referred, the calculations, of course, had been made upon past and not upon prospective rates; but, taking the figures for last year, he found that the poor rate had been raised on an assessment of £905,000, and the county rate, according to the assessment of 1864, was on a sum of £1,076,000; but that assessment had been raised to £1,250,000, so that the poor rate assessment of the parish was still £350,000 less than what was acknowledged to be its proper amount of county assessment. That was a striking instance of what had been, and what might still be, if these valuations continued to be made by different justices of the peace, in different counties, and at irregular intervals. The different modes of ascertaining the annual value, to which reference had been made by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda), might be dealt with and corrected in the scale of reductions hereafter to be laid down. By the Bill of 1867 those premises which were used partly as dwellings and partly as manufactories, were bound to follow the established uniformity of principle.

Mr. Brewer

When the Bill was brought in it would be found that its tendency was not to lower or to raise any special classes of property, but simply to establish uniformity in the principle of assessing all kinds of property.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for uniformity in the Assessment of Rateable Property in the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. ARTHUR PEEL, and Mr. AYRTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 12.]

RATEABLE PROPERTY BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. GOSCHEN, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for a common basis of value for the purposes of Government and local taxation, and to promote uniformity in the assessment of rateable property in England, said, that as this Bill resembled in its general provisions the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), introduced last Session, he would not occupy the House by describing its provisions at the present time. He hoped, however, soon to be able to lay the Bill on the table of the House.

MR. CANDLISH said, he wished to know if the same principle was to be applied to borrowed capital for the counties as was applied to that for the metropolis? He also wished to ask whether the borrowed capital was to be repaid throughout the term of its repayment by equal annual instalments? At present, it was provided the amount should be re-paid in thirty equal payments; but that was impossible, taking into consideration that the amount of interest differed and diminished every year. He thought there ought to be something in the nature of a sinking fund for the purpose, and that money borrowed for general purposes ought to be made a union, instead of a parish charge.

MR. PEASE asked, whether it was intended to equalize the rating of all mines, and to bring under assessment metallic as well as coal mines?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, the Bill would be limited practically to the uniformity of assessment of rateable property, and would consequently not include the assessment of any new kinds of property. That question was under consideration; but he was unable to say whether there would be time to deal with it this Session. As to loans, it appeared to him that any changes made in reference to them ought rather to be made in the laws under which they were contracted, than in the present Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for a common basis of value for the purposes of Government and Local Taxation, and to promote uniformity in the Assessment of Rateable Property in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. ARTHUR PEEL, and Mr. AYRTON.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. MAC EVOY, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the Act of the 14 & 15 Vict., c. 60, intituled, "An Act to prevent the Assumption of certain Ecclesiastical Titles in respect of places in the United Kingdom," and of sec. 24 of the Act of 10 Geo. IV., c. 7, said, the House had, on two former occasions, allowed him to introduce a similar Bill, and the subject had been fully discussed and considered by Select Committees of both Houses of Parliament. The present Leader of the House, and many of his Colleagues had given their most strenuous opposition to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act when it originally passed, and the Leader of the present Opposition was kind enough, on a former occasion, to allow the introduction of the Bill, which he now had the honour to submit to the House for the third time. The present political circumstances of the country justified him in the belief that the Bill would be received in a fair and candid spirit by the House. He did not propose to go into the policy of his proposal then, but only to ask the House to consent to the introduction of the Bill, and read it a first time, and he would place the second reading on such a day as would give every hon. Member an opportunity of stating his views with regard to it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member for Meath had correctly stated that the late House permitted the introduction of this Bill; but he could not think that the few words which had fallen from the hon. Member would at all inform the new House of the importance of the measure which he had undertaken to introduce. He could scarcely account for an individual Member of the House, unconnected with the Administration, undertaking so grave a constitutional question as was involved in this particular, unless it was that he represented something more than an ordinary constituency, for the House had been officially informed that the measure had received the sanction of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholics in Ireland and England. It was true, as the hon. Member had stated, that a Committee of this House was appointed in the Session of 1867, and went into the matter of this Bill; but he should not now allude particularly to the circumstances connected with the Bill further than to say that the House was kind enough to excuse him from serving, although he was nominated on the Committee, on the grounds that he did not think the Committee was fairly constituted, and also that there was not time to complete the investigation of so grave a matter. The Committee sat up to the end of the Session, and the result of its investigation was that the Report, with the hon. Member for Meath as the Chairman of the Committee, was carried by a majority of 1. In 1868, the House of Lords appointed a Committee to inquire into the subject-matter of the Bill, and he would beg to refer the House to the Report of that Committee and the most important evidence that was taken by it. The result of that Committee was entirely adverse to the hon. Member's proposal. The evidence tendered before the Committee of this House was rather of a remarkable character. Not one witness was examined in support of the existing law—an Act that was passed in 1851 by repeated majorities in this House, and supported by an overwhelming majority of demonstrations in the country. The House of Lords had decided that it would be unconstitutional and inconsistent with the supremacy of the law of this country that the Act declaratory of the Common Law of the country in maintaining the Supremacy of the Crown should be abrogated as proposed by the hon. Member. He was unwilling to detain the House long, but he wished to put one point before them. A most eminent Roman Catholic barrister was examined before the Committee of that House in 1861—namely, Mr. Hope Scott—and, by way of illustrating one portion of this subject, he would read an extract from his evidence, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University embodied in his first Report, but which was rejected by a majority of 1. Mr. Hope Scott was asked, with reference to the relative position of the two Churches—the Established Church and the Roman Church—that, if a Bishop was intruded into the see of another Bishop in this country it would be, in the eye of that portion of the Church at all events which was in the country, a schismatical act? His answer was most remarkable—

“There can be no doubt about it. The fact is, that the Roman Catholic Church would not be justified in placing bishops anywhere in England or in Ireland, if it did not deny the authority, practically speaking, of the Bishops of the Establishment; it is, of course, an issue between the two religions, which it is of no use blinking.”

Then Mr. Hope Scott was further asked—

“But the Roman Catholic Church assumes that the English episcopate has no existence in England;”

and the answer was “Most undoubtedly.” He (Mr. Newdegate) begged to call the attention of the House to this subject, because it was not merely a matter of religion, but the House would observe from the answer which he had read that it was a question of establishment and authority. It was the authority of the Established Church as charged by the State with the cure of all souls; that was with the function of extending to all the community its services if they would accept them. It was that function which the Roman Catholic Church disputed, and asserted its rights against the present position of the Established Church. A proposal was before the country to disestablish the Protestant Church in Ireland. Mr. Hope Scott had declared the claims of the Roman Catholic Church to establishment by claiming authority, not over persons of its own communion only, but over all baptized Christians; and that this should be sanctioned by law, and sanctioned by the repeal of the statute which forbade the exercise of that authority and jurisdiction. Therefore, the position was this, that when a proposal was before the country, and would soon be before the House, for the disestablishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland, an hon. Member of the House introduced a Bill which would virtually sanction the establishment of the Roman Catholic Church throughout the United Kingdom. He did not wish longer to detain the House, but he would refer the new Members to two sources of information—the evidence and Report of a Committee of this House, presented in 1867, and the evidence and Report before the House of Lords presented last year.

MR. WALPOLE said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had stated very accurately what had taken place in 1867 and 1868, in reference to the proposal now made to repeal what was called the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. There was only one thing he (Mr. Walpole) would wish to add to the statement, and that was, in consequence of the observation which fell from his hon. Friend, that no evidence was taken against the repeal of the Bill by the Committee of the House of Commons, for some reasons unintelligible to his hon. Friend, and for some reasons which his hon. Friend thought ought to have operated on the minds of the Committee in a different way. And, now, what he wished to remind his hon. Friend of was, that what the Committee considered to be the case, as presented to them, was simply this:—A case of grievance was attempted to be made out, but the whole question of practical grievance was entirely refuted, and it then simply appeared to the Committee that it was not necessary to go into evidence. When the matter came on for discussion, these matters might be more fully noticed. He agreed that this Bill, having been already twice introduced into the House of Commons, it would not perhaps be courteous to the hon. Member, or altogether respectful to the House, to oppose the present Motion; but he must be permitted to observe that the measure, having been carried after the fullest discussion, proposed, as it had been, not by a Conservative, but by a Liberal Government; and having met the general consent and approbation of the people, the hon. Gentleman must expect that those who had seen no cause to change their opinions would continue to give their most strenuous opposition to the alteration of what they regarded as a most important part of the legislation of this country. He had no objection to the introduction of the Bill, but he hoped that due Notice would be given of the time fixed for its second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to repeal the Act of the fourteenth and fifteenth Victoria, chapter sixty, intituled, "An Act to prevent the Assumption of certain Ecclesiastical Titles in respect of Places in the United Kingdom," and Section Twenty-four of the Act of the tenth George the Fourth, chapter seven, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MACEVOR, Mr. WILLIAM GREGORY, Sir ROWLAND BLENNERHASSETT, and Mr. CORBALLY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 13.]

DUMFRIESSHIRE ELECTION.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS, in moving that a Select Committee of seven Members be appointed "to consider whether Sir Sydney Hedley Waterlow is disqualified from sitting and voting as a Member of this House under the Statute 22 Geo. 3, c. 45, and to report their opinion thereon," said it would be remembered that at the last General Election, after a strong contest, Sir Sydney Waterlow had been declared duly elected for Dumfriesshire; but in conformity with the Act of last year, a petition had been presented against that return; and among the allegations of that petition was one that the hon. Member was disqualified and ineligible to be elected a Member of the House in consequence of being interested in a Government contract. After the petition was presented, and before the time came for it to be tried, it was withdrawn, under the sanction of judicial authority, and without the least imputation on any of the parties. The result of the withdrawal had been to place the hon. Member in a position in which no hon. Gentleman ought to remain. Ordinarily, if a petition was presented against a return and afterwards withdrawn, all the allegations which went to vacate the seat fell to the ground, and the Member petitioned against, the petition having been withdrawn, stood in precisely the same situation as every other Member for the purpose of discharging his duty. But in this instance, although the petition had been withdrawn, the allegation as to disqualification remained, and the difficulty was how that question should be determined. It would have been determined if the petition had been proceeded with. It could now also be determined but in a way which he thought no hon. Member should be bound to have recourse to—namely, by his sitting and voting with the certain prospect—for the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire had received notice to that effect—of being sued for the penalty of £500, for every day he sat and voted, which a Court of Law might inflict upon him. That was the position in which the hon. Member would be placed if the proposal he was about to make referring the question whether he was disqualified from sitting to a Select Committee were not adopted. At present the hon. Member might hold his seat without taking his place in the House, a course of which no one would approve, or he could accept Office under the Crown—the Chiltern Hundreds—and vacate his seat, a course of which the hon. Member's constituents disapproved, for they had elected him and he enjoyed their confidence; or he might take his seat in the House, running the risk of the serious consequences which might result from his so doing. He saw no reason why the hon. Member should be expected to take any of these courses, and he therefore proposed the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the case. He made this Motion at the earnest request of the hon. Member himself, who desired to act in accordance with the decision of the House.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"To consider whether Sir Sydney Hedley Waterlow is disqualified from sitting and voting as a Member of this House under the statute 22 Geo. 3, c. 45, and to Report their opinion thereon."—(Mr. Thomas Chambers.)

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE thought that Sir Sydney Waterlow should adopt the second alternative mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and vacate his seat, because that portion of the electors of Dumfriesshire who were opposed to the worthy Alderman were determined, whatever might be the decision of a Committee of that House, to proceed for the full penalties if Sir Sydney Waterlow should take his seat in the House. This case did not run on all fours with that of Baron Rothschild in 1855, when contractor for a Government loan, and therefore there was no use in appointing a Select Committee, the hon. Member having admitted that he held the contract for stationery at the time of the election, though he had since resigned it.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it might be well to consider what better position the hon. Member would be in after a reference to a Select Committee and a Report thereupon. Without presuming to venture a positive opinion, it occurred to him that the hon. Member would be exactly in the same position after the Committee had reported as he was before, inasmuch as that decision could not be pleaded as an answer to an action for penalties in a Court of Law. It would simply be a preliminary inquiry which might bring that House into conflict with a Court of Law. He would therefore advise him to accept the Chiltern Hundreds.

MR. WALPOLE observed, that the question was an important one for the House to consider. He thought it would be very unadvisable to take any step which might possibly bring the House into conflict with the Courts of Law. He understood his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. Chambers) to say that the law was clear, but that the facts were of such a nature that Sir Sydney Waterlow ought not to be brought within the provisions of the statute. Now, if his hon. and learned Friend could so lay the facts before the House as clearly to show that Sir Sydney Waterlow's seat could not be questioned in point of law, there might then possibly be some reason for the appointment of a Committee. There were the cases of Daniel Whittle Harvey and another which had been referred to Committees; but those cases differed from the present. There the Members had taken their seats; whereas the hon. Member (Sir Sydney Waterlow) had never taken his seat at all. That seemed to him to put the question on a different footing, and he did not see what advantage would be gained by referring the matter to a Committee, while it might possibly bring a difficulty upon the House which it should be their wish to avoid. It might be very unpleasant for the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire to accept the Chiltern Hundreds; but that would certainly be the most desirable course, as it would prevent any collision with the Courts of Law.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) had forgot the most important precedent which existed on this matter—he meant the precedent of the case of Baron Lionel Rothschild in 1855. If he (the Lord Advocate) were not much mistaken, all the objections which the right hon. Genleman had urged to the course now proposed would have been equally applicable to that case. There had been the previous case of Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, which was referred to a Committee, and the Committee found that Mr. Harvey was disqualified. But if the Committee had come to a contrary decision, and Mr. Harvey had, in consequence, taken his seat, the same risk, as was now suggested, of conflict with the Courts of Law would have risen. The case of Baron Rothschild no doubt raised the question whether a contractor for a loan was within the statute; but the right hon. Gentleman would not forget that the Motion that was made in the House was one for the issue of a new Writ, because it was so plain and palpable on the face of the contract that he was disqualified, that it was no use for the House to make any further inquiry. But the right hon. Gentleman himself was the Member who resisted that proposal, and proposed that there should be substituted for it:—

"That the Contract entered into by Baron Lionel de Rothschild with Her Majesty's Government, on the 20th day of April last, for a loan of £16,000,000 for the Public Service be referred to a Select Committee, and that they be directed to report their opinion whether Baron Lionel Nathan de Rothschild has vacated his Seat by his entering into the said Contract."—[3 Hansard, cxxxix. 169.]

That Amendment was adopted after a long debate, and the result was that the Committee found that he had not vacated his seat by entering into the contract. That was exactly the position in which the present case stood, with this exception, that Baron Rothschild at that time was under another disability from taking his seat in that House. But here the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire (Sir Sydney Waterlow) said he was elected for that county, and why should he be asked to accept the Chiltern Hundreds if, in point of fact, he had been well elected? If he had not been well elected the sooner he was made aware of that fact the better. He (the Lord Advocate) conceived it to be somewhat unconstitutional on the part of the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) to suggest that a certain number of the electors of Dumfriesshire were prepared to set the decision of that House at naught if it should be unfavourable to their views. If it were competent to other persons to take the case into a Court of Law, the House, of course, could take no cognizance of that. The question was whether in a matter which concerned the privileges of this House it was not right to do as had been done before—namely, make a full inquiry and take the opinion of the House upon the subject. What might happen after that opinion was given was another matter; but he could not help thinking it very improbable that the question would be tried in a Court of Law if it appeared to the Committee that the hon. Member (Sir Sydney Waterlow) was not within the statute. Apart from the particular question which had arisen here, the whole machinery of these statutes would be much better for revision. It was a barbarous state of the law under which a doubtful question of this kind could not be resolved without the risk of enormous penalties for every day the Member took his seat. Under the circumstances he hoped the House would throw no impediment in the way of the appointment of the Committee.

SIR JOHN HAY said, his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir James Elphinstone) had no wish to enforce the penalties, but thought it only just to Sir Sydney Waterlow that he should have timely notice that certain persons were prepared to proceed against him under the statute of George III. The opinion of a Committee of this House would not in any way prevent these persons from adopting such a course, and his hon. Friend had merely expressed his belief that such a course would be adopted. It was for the House to decide whether it was desirable that a conflict should arise between a Court of Law and a Committee of the House.

MR. KINNAIRD said, the question really seemed to be one of privilege. Two Members of that House appeared to have communicated with another Member something that they intended to do.

SIR JOHN HAY wished to explain. He had not communicated, nor had any one else, to his knowledge, communicated to the worthy Alderman anything he intended to do. All that had been communicated was what public rumour said would be done.

MR. KINNAIRD regarded the explanation as a distinction without a difference. An hon. Member had been informed within the precincts of the House that in the event of his sitting and voting certain penalties would be attempted to be exacted. That was a matter of privilege, and the only way for the House to protect the Member was to appoint a Committee. There need be no apprehension of a collision with the law; for, if an impartial Committee decided that the Member was properly seated, it was not likely that a Court of Law would be inclined to dispute the decision.

MR. CARNEGIE reminded the House that it was competent for the hon. Baronet or for any other person to appear before the Court of Session and to object to the withdrawal of the petition against Sir Sydney Waterlow's return. If they had wished to raise the question that was the constitutional mode of doing so. The course now taken seemed to be less for the vindication of the privileges of the House than for the purpose of simple annoyance.

MR. RYLANDS said, he would vote for the Motion if it were pressed, but he hoped the result of the discussion would be that steps would be taken in the direction pointed out by the learned Lord (the Lord Advocate). Very serious injustice was done by the operation of the Act of George III. There were many Members of that House indirectly interested in Government contracts, but who did not come under the operation of the Act, while a member of a private firm, having undertaken a contract from which he had sought to free himself, was placed in the very disagreeable situation of being threatened with proceedings for the enforcement of penalties if he sat or voted in the House. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley), who sat upon the Opposition side of the House, was in a position somewhat similar to that of the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire (Sir Sydney Waterlow) in regard to a small contract, and his case was now before the Judges, and it appeared that the Act of George III. had the effect of excluding from the House many gentlemen who would be very desirable Members. That Act was passed when a vast amount of jobbery had been perpetrated in connection with Members of that House, and when many Members represented rotten boroughs, and only came into Parliament for the purpose of making merchandize of the seats which they had purchased. In such a state of things, it was much to the credit of the Parliament of that day that it passed an Act imposing such stringent penalties upon

Members who held contracts under the Government. They had now, however, Members representing large constituencies; those constituencies kept their eyes upon their representatives; public opinion was brought to bear upon Members; and there was no longer any necessity for any such guarantee as that provided by the Act now under discussion. He hoped, whatever might be the result of the Motion before the House, the effect of the discussion would be the repeal of this section of the Act of George III.

MR. HUNT said, that two questions seemed to be under discussion, one being what the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire (Sir Sydney Waterlow) ought to do, and the other what the House ought to do. Now, the only question with which they were really concerned was the latter. It had been brought to the knowledge of the House that one of its seats was said to be vacant, and he did not see how the point could be ascertained except by the appointment of the proposed Committee. If the Committee reported that the hon. Member was interested in a contract and that his case came within the statute, the House would no doubt determine that the seat was void and that there must be another election. If not, it would then be for the hon. Member to determine whether he would abide by the Report of the Committee and run the risk of penalties in a Court of Law. He saw no reason for objecting to the appointment of the Committee. In the event of the penalties being sought for under such circumstances, there might, indeed, as had been said, be some danger of a collision between the House and the Courts of Law, but there was no escape from that position, and it would be, as he said, for the hon. Member (Sir Sydney Waterlow) to take the course that seemed to him most advisable, as soon as the deliberations of the Committee were over.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to consider whether Sir Sydney Hedley Waterlow is disqualified from sitting and voting as a Member of this House under the Statute 22 Geo. 3, c. 45, and to Report their opinion thereon."—(Mr. Thomas Chambers.)

PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Common Law Courts (Ireland)* (9).

PUBLIC BUSINESS—BILLS RELATING TO IRELAND.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he desired to learn what Bills relating to Ireland, more particularly with reference to Law Reform, it was the intention of the Government to propose to introduce into Parliament during the present Session. Some surprise and dissatisfaction had been excited in Ireland by the very meagre notice taken of that country in Her Majesty's Speech; for though the Ecclesiastical arrangements had been mentioned as likely to require a great amount of attention—as would, no doubt, be the case—they would not engross all, or nearly all, the time at the disposal of Parliament. As far, moreover, as their Lordships were concerned, complaints had been made that a great part of the Session was likely to elapse before measures of importance would come before them. Now there were several subjects which—though not of great importance as regards Imperial interests—were nevertheless of great interest to the people of Ireland; which measures might be advantageously introduced in their Lordships' House. He did not, of course, allude to the great measure on the Irish Church, nor to Parliamentary Reform, though he thought that Ireland stood very much in need of some well-considered measure on that subject; nor did he refer to the important questions of education or the land system. Although those matters were referred to at almost every hustings in Ireland during the late General Election, and the people seemed to attach great importance to them, there had been expressed an intention on the part of the Government not to legislate on these questions this Session. He could not help thinking that some reference ought to have been made to some of those questions in the Royal Speech, if only in deference to the public opinion existing in Ireland, as well as to the amendment of the law referring to grand juries, which was very desirable. It had been stated that a Bill on the latter subject had been prepared, and he could not understand why, in that case, it was not at once introduced to their Lordships' House, for it would involve a great deal of detail, with which a Select Committee could best deal. But he specially referred to an amendment of the Common Law procedure of Ireland which was very much needed. The working of the existing system, which was based on the Act of 1853, was very unsatisfactory. In 1861 he obtained a Commission of Inquiry, of which no less than five ex-Lord Chancellors were Members, and their Report recommended a number of important changes. It pointed out that there had been no attempt to extend to Ireland the beneficial provisions of the English Act of 1860, and it urged the propriety of assimilating the English and Irish systems as far as possible. He thought this might be very easily accomplished, and that the Irish procedure might be adapted to the English in almost all its provisions. Unfortunately there was an impression in Ireland that no legal reforms for that country were desired by the Law Officers of any administration, unless they created patronage or appointments which were acceptable to the promoters. He hoped that this impression, which had not been without some appearance of truth, would be removed by future legislation. Then there was the question of bankruptcy. Certain provisions of the English Law which were indisputably good—such as those bringing non-traders within its operation—might be extended to Ireland, and that country might share the benefit of a measure carried by Mr. Moffatt last Session for checking fraudulent composition deeds. Legislation on these subjects would show the people of Ireland that Parliament was anxious, irrespective of great party questions, to promote their prosperity and welfare, and he hoped the noble Earl (Earl Granville) would be able to inform their Lordships that some measures would, on an early day, be brought before them, in order that they might have a good chance of passing through both Houses during the Session.

EARL GRANVILLE replied that the noble Marquess must be aware that whatever grievances Ireland might have to complain of they certainly would not, this Session, include that of being entirely neglected by Parliament. With reference to the minor measures mentioned by the noble Marquess, he was not aware that it was the intention of the Irish Department to introduce a Bankruptcy Bill this year. He would make inquiries on the subject; but it was obvious that there might be an advantage in settling a comprehensive and satisfactory scheme for England before extending any of the provisions of the existing law to Ireland. A Bill referring to grand juries and another relating to prisons had been prepared; but before introducing them into this House it would be necessary to consider whether, having regard to the claims of other measures, there was a reasonable chance of their passing through both Houses of the Legislature during the present Session. It would be a satisfaction to him if, on inquiry, he found himself in a position to introduce one or both of those Bills into this House. With regard to a measure relating to Common Law Procedure in Ireland, he had a more satisfactory reply to give. He was glad to be able to say that he would move at the end of the evening a Bill based on the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1861, alluded to by the noble Marquess.

CRIMINAL LAW—REPRESSION OF CRIME.—NOTICE.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, their Lordships might perhaps be pleased to learn that a Bill which was to have been introduced by the Secretary of State for the Home Department into the other

The Marquess of Clanricarde

House of Parliament had been withdrawn from that House, in order that their Lordships might have some occupation at the beginning of the Session. He now begged to give Notice that he would on Friday next call the attention of the House to the necessity of further measures for the better repression of Crime, and that he should then take the opportunity of explaining the provisions of the Bill to be introduced on the subject.

COMMON LAW COURTS (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Pleading, Practice, and Procedure of the Courts of Common Law in Ireland—Was presented by The Earl GRANVILLE; read 1st. (No. 9.)

SELECT COMMITTEE—Standing Orders, nominated; on Committee of Selection, nominated.
PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—University Tests; Money Laws (Ireland).
Ordered—Revenue Officers; University Tests; Money Laws (Ireland); Libel; Civil Offices.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.—QUESTION.

MR. BOURKE said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose to carry out any of the Recommendations which were made by the Royal Commissioners in the year 1859 on the subject of Life Harbours and Harbours of Refuge?

MR. BRIGHT: The hon. Gentleman, I presume, knows that the Commission to which he refers made two principal suggestions, one of which past Boards of Trade and Governments have altogether refused to adopt, and the second of which has been in course of adoption from the time the Report of the Commission was issued. I need not, I think, enter into detail in the matter. It may be sufficient to say that money is constantly advanced by the Public Works Loan Commissioners at the low rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ or $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent to all places in which there are persons resident who deem a harbour to be desirable, and are willing to give security for the money so advanced. The Board of Trade feels perfectly assured that if the first suggestion of the Commission was adopted it would lead to an almost unlimited expenditure of the public money; and if any hon. Member wishes to make up his mind on that point, he has only to turn to the evidence taken before the Commission, from which he will find that the particular locality from which any witness happened to come was, in his opinion, not simply the best, but, in point of fact, the only place at which a harbour of refuge ought to be established, all other places being of no use for the purpose. The course which the Board of Trade has hitherto taken in the matter is that which it proposes to continue to pursue, and it will, therefore, make no change in its policy so far as the Report of the Commission is concerned.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.—QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it be his intention to follow the example of his predecessors in bringing forward the Indian Budget on the last week of the Session of Parliament, or whether he desires to alter the period of making up the Indian Accounts to such a date as will enable him to lay them upon the Table of the House at the opening of the Session of Parliament, so that the Budget may be brought forward, and Indian questions discussed previously to the pressure of other business?

MR. GRANT DUFF said, in reply to the first part of the Question, that nobody could be more anxious than he was that the Indian financial statement should be made to the House at a time when it would suit the convenience of all those hon. Members who took an interest in Indian affairs to be present in their places, and to aid the Government by their information and advice. With regard to the second part of the Question, the state of the case was this:—In the year 1866, in consequence of a Notice given in this House by his hon. Friend (Mr. J. B. Smith), this whole subject was most carefully gone into by the Government of India, acting under the directions of the then Secretary of State, and the Government of India came to the conclusion that the views of those persons who regretted that the financial statement was made so late in the Session would be best met by altering the old Indian financial year, which used to end on the 30th of April, and making it end on the 31st of March, the same as the English financial year. That change had been approved by the Home Government, and since it had come into operation there was nothing to prevent the Indian Budget from being laid before the House a month earlier than could previously have been the case, if such were the will of the House. A change in the financial year caused, of course, a great amount of inconvenience in India, and it would not, therefore, be reasonable to adopt any suggestion for a further change until the present system had been sufficiently tried, and it was ascertained whether it worked well or not.

FACTORY RETURNS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAINES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can inform the House when the Factory Returns, ordered by the House so long since as the 2nd of December 1867, are likely to be presented; and also when the Reports of the Factory Inspectors for October 31, 1868, will be laid before the House?

MR. BRUCE said, that the Returns mentioned in the first part of his hon. Friend's Question which had been so long delayed would, he was informed, be on the table of the House in about three weeks; while the Reports of the Factory Inspectors would be produced in about a week.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS.—QUESTION.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering the evils made public by the Report of the Rivers Commission, it be the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, any measure for the prevention of the pollution of rivers and watercourses?

MR. BRUCE said, that the important Commission presided over by Sir William Denison was now engaged in examining the Ribble and Mersey, which flowed through the chief manufacturing districts of the country, but until they had pursued their inquiries further he could not say when the Report would be presented; although, from communications he had held with them, he was not without hopes that they would be able to lay down principles which would enable the House to legislate on this subject without causing any serious interruption to our manufacturing establishments.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE ARMY.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, under the Warrant appointing the Commander in Chief of the Army, any doubt arises as to the relative position of the Commander in Chief and the Secretary of State for War; whether it is or is not the case that the authority of the Secretary of State is supreme in all that relates to the administration of the Army, and that it can, if necessary, be brought to bear upon minor promotions as well as upon the higher military appointments, and also upon matters connected with the discipline of the Army; whether, in the present administration of the Army, there is any approach to dual Government other than that which necessarily arises from the Secretary of State for War and his Staff being in one building, while the Officer charged with the discipline of the Army is with his Staff located in another; and, whether any steps are being taken, or are about to be taken, with a view to the more speedy and economical transaction of business, to concentrate the War Departments in one building?

MR. CARDWELL: In answer to my noble Friend I have to state that his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge is not Commander-in-Chief of the Army. His proper designation is Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief. As such he is appointed, not by warrant, but only by what is technically called a letter of service addressed to him, by command of Her Majesty, by the Secretary of State for War. It is the case, to use the language of my noble Friend, that the authority of the Secretary of State for War—that is to say, the authority of Her Majesty's Government exercised by him is supreme in all that relates to the administration of the army, it is brought to bear on minor promotions as well as on the higher military appointments, and I entirely concur with the opinion implied by my noble Friend, that it ought to be brought to bear, if necessary, in matters connected with the discipline of the army. Having stated that the authority of the Secretary of State is supreme, I, of course, agree in the opinion indicated by my noble Friend that there exists in principle no dual government, and I concur in the belief that when the question of the amalgamation of the public offices is settled, a great improvement in the transaction of business will result from having the two Departments of army administration associated in the same building. I have only further to say that I beg to reserve to myself entire freedom to use my discretion with regard to any changes in the two Departments which experience may prove to me to be desirable in the interest of the public service.

RETURNS OF INDIAN OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, For an explanation of the discrepancies between the Parliamentary Return, No. 440, respecting the prospective annual number of Officers of the different ranks in the Indian Armies, and Returns drawn up by Officers in India; for instance, the Parliamentary Return states there will be 480 Lieutenants in 1873, while the Returns drawn up by the Officers in India give only 13 Lieutenants—namely, 11 at Bengal, 2 at Madras, and nil at Bombay?

MR. GRANT DUFF said, the explanation for which his hon. and gallant Friend asked might be easily given. The fact was, that the Returns in question took no notice of the deaths that must inevitably occur among the officers between the years 1867 and 1873. The Parliamentary Return, on the other hand, took notice of those deaths. The Returns to which his hon. and gallant Friend called their attention, not taking any notice of the death vacancies, took at the same time, of course, no notice of the new appointments by which those vacancies would be filled. In that way the very startling difference in the results was arrived at.

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN SHEEP AND CATTLE.—QUESTION.

MR. SYNAN said, he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether the Orders of the 20th August and 19th October 1868, regulating the importation of sheep from the Continent of Europe have been revoked; and, if so, whether any and what regulations have been substituted for preventing the importation of diseased sheep or sheep from infected districts? He also wished to know whether the Government proposed to substitute any new regulations for those of the month of August last, which they had just revoked?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not give a different Answer upon that occasion from that which he had given on the preceding evening to his right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam). The Government did not propose to issue any fresh regulations with respect to the importation of sheep in consequence of the revocation of the Order referred to. Importation of sheep will in future be conducted under the same conditions as were in force before the 20th of August last, which were briefly these:—Sheep that arrived in ships in which there was no foreign cattle were allowed unrestricted removal; but for the future the Custom House authorities had been directed to observe especial care in that examination. The latest official information they had received from the Continent in reference to that subject was contained in a despatch dated 3rd of February, to the effect that sheep-pox had abated in the neighbourhood of Rotterdam, and that everywhere else in Holland it had disappeared. Since that time he had seen a letter from the Minister for the Netherlands, which stated that the sheep-pox might be said to have disappeared altogether from that country.

PAY OF ADMIRALTY CLERKS. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Why it is that an Order in Council, dated February 16, 1866, having directed an increase of pay to be given to Third Class Clerks in the Departments of the Principal Offices of the Admiralty, a section of that class, neither senior nor junior, but intermediate, is excluded from its operation; and, whether he is aware that the present Solicitor General has delivered an opinion in writing to the effect that such exclusion is unjustifiable?

MR. CHILDERS: By an Order in Council of the 16th of February, 1866, the salaries of the third class clerks at Somerset House, which had commenced at £90, rising annually by £10 to £300, were fixed at £100, rising for the first eight years by £10, and afterwards by £15. By permission of the Treasury, in addition to this improvement, which affected all the third class clerks, those who had then completed eight years' service were allowed such further addition to their salaries as would have been the result if such a scale had been in force when they were appointed. The clerks with less than eight years' service petitioned that this second boon should be also granted to them. This was refused by the Duke of Somerset's Admiralty in April, 1866, and by the late Board in July, 1866, and February, 1868. The application was renewed in November, 1868, and left by the late Board for the consideration of their successors. With the application was an opinion by Mr. Coleridge, but not the case submitted to him. As it was my intention to undertake at once a revision of the Somerset House establishments, it was evidently not the moment to consider whether the decision made by both the former Boards should be reversed. That revision is now going on. The additional charge created by the Order in Council of the 16th of February, 1866, amounts to £2,043 9s. 4d. The annual cost of the additional boon solicited by the clerks with less than eight years' service would amount to £1,040.

LOCAL MANAGEMENT OF THE METROPOLIS.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, during the present Session, to bring in any Bill for the better administration of Local Management of the Metropolis?

Mr. BRUCE, in reply, said, he was sorry to say Her Majesty's Government could not undertake to deal with this subject during the present Session.

ENGLISH FISHERIES.—QUESTION.

Mr. BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that the Judgment of the Special Commissioners for English Fisheries, which was delivered at Workington on the 10th of December last, and which he has undertaken to lay upon the Table of the House, is of great length, and is also under appeal to the Court of Common Pleas; and whether, under the circumstances, it is not desirable that the production of the Papers should be postponed until the case has been finally decided?

Mr. BRUCE said, he did not think the decision of the Common Pleas should affect the publication of the judgment. The Commissioners suggested a certain alteration of the law from reasons of public policy, and their recommendations in this respect could not be affected by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas as to what the law was upon another point. It was true the judgment of the Special Commissioners was voluminous, but it was also very able, and it would be of great advantage to hon. Members to have it before them in considering the question to be submitted to the House.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether an outbreak of Rinderpest has been reported to have taken place in Germany; and, whether the Dutch Government have not despatched a staff of officials to Zevenaar to exercise an active supervision over the German frontier?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, the Government had no intimation of an outbreak of rinderpest in Germany, nor any reason to believe the report true. Immediately Notice of the Question had been given questions were forwarded by telegraph to various places on the Continent, but the only answer received was from the Hague. It was true the Dutch had despatched officials to the German frontier, not, however, in consequence of an outbreak of rinderpest in Germany, but because of its existence in Galicia and Transylvania; and the Government believed the existence of rinderpest in these countries had given rise to the rumour.

THE "WILL-OF-THE-WISP" JOURNAL: QUESTION.

Mr. HARDCASTLE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Admiralty just before the General Election subscribed for a large number of copies of a weekly periodical called the Will-of-the-Wisp; whether the subscription to that paper has been discontinued since the present Board of Admiralty took Office; and, on what ground the subscription was made and discontinued?

Mr. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend I have to state that, on the 15th of October last, the officer who advises the Admiralty as to the periodicals to be supplied to the fleet and the naval hospitals, recommended that the usual numbers should be subscribed for in the case of two weekly papers—Judy and the Will-of-the-Wisp, and ninety-six of each of these papers were consequently ordered. On the 11th of December the same officer recommended that the subscription to the Will-of-the-Wisp should be discontinued, and orders accordingly were given on the 14th of December. In reference to the second part of the Question, I have to state that the present Board took office a week or ten days later; that I had therefore nothing to do with the discontinuance of the paper, and that the first I heard of the subscription or its discontinuance was by having pointed out to me an article in the Will-of-the-Wisp in which strong language was used against me personally for having stopped the paper. The reason why the two papers were recommended to be subscribed for was that they were likely to exercise a beneficial influence over the crews of Her Majesty's ships. I have no wish to hurt any one's feelings, and I will therefore request my hon. Friend to excuse me if I do not give the reason why the late Board of Admiralty were advised to discontinue the Will-of-the-Wisp.

Mr. Bentinck

IRELAND—RELEASE OF FENIAN CONVICTS.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he would take that opportunity of answering a Question which had been put to him on the preceding evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy). The right hon. Gentleman asked, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to send home, at the public expense, those Fenian prisoners in Australia to whom the clemency of the Crown had just been extended. In reference to that point he had to observe that the general practice at the Home Office, with respect to convicts who had received a free pardon in Australia, was not to furnish them with a free passage home, unless in those cases in which the pardon had been granted in consequence of some error in the conviction, or the existence of a belief in the original innocence of the parties. With respect to that particular Question, without saying or implying that that general rule would be departed from, he desired to reserve to the Government entire freedom whether they would or would not enforce it in the case of those convicts generally or of any one of them.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—ARREST OF A CHILD.—QUESTION.

Mr. GEORGE JENKINSON rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has obtained further information in reference to the case of a girl under fourteen years of age, who was taken away last week from the Girls' Refuge at Ealing by the Sheriff's Officers for a supposed debt of £53 11s. 2d., and conveyed to Whitecross Street Prison, and detained there; and, whether, if that statement be true, any person has committed a breach of the Law in so arresting and detaining such girl; and, if so, whether he intends to take any further steps in reference to the matter?

Mr. BRUCE said, that from the information he had received—which however, was not undisputed—he believed the girl had been removed from the Refuge under a mistake as to her age. He could not speak with certainty as to the law on the subject, but he gathered from the text books that an infant might be arrested on a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, and that an infant might be outlawed if above the age of twelve, or even under that age if a female.

VACATING OF SEATS BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

VISCOUNT BURY rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal section 26 of the Act of the sixth of Queen Anne, cap. 7, relating to the Re-election of Members accepting Office under the Crown. Under ordinary circumstances he should not have detained the House by any observations in support of his Motion; but since he had come down to the House he understood that the Motion was to be opposed. He did not know on what grounds that opposition was to be based; but he would earnestly entreat the House not to decide until they had the Bill before them, and had an opportunity of forming a judgment upon the merits of his proposition. He submitted that it was rather an unusual course that a Member who asked leave to bring in a Bill should not be allowed to lay it on the table. He felt it would be more respectful to the House not to make a speech on the present occasion, and he should therefore be glad if he should be allowed to wait for a few moments to see what course the Opposition might take, and then to submit any observations in reply he might have to offer.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal section twenty-six of the Act of the sixth year of Queen Anne, chapter seven, relating to the Re-election of Members accepting office under the Crown."—(Viscount Bury.)

Mr. WHITE said, that he would oppose the introduction of this Bill, and when the noble Lord complained of it as an unusual and, he believed, an unwarrantable proceeding, he begged to remind him such was not the case. Some ten or twelve years ago, when the noble Viscount was a Member of the House, a Bill was brought in by Mr. Wrightson, the Member for Northallerton, which went no further than the proposal contained in the measure of the late Government—namely, that certain Officers in the employment of the Crown, in case of promotion or transference, need not vacate their seats; and leave to introduce it was refused on every occasion it was moved for. It was not for private Members to be tinkering and tampering with the fundamental principles of the Constitution of Parliament. Again, in the last Parliament, of which the noble Lord was not a Member, it would be recollected that Lord Amberley moved a clause to the exact effect of the Bill the noble Lord now proposed to introduce, and the right hon. Gentleman who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer very properly remarked—and in that he had the acquiescence of the House—that the clause in the Reform Bill of 1867 went as far as was desirable in mitigating the severity of the statute of Anne. But now the noble Lord seemed to think that no one ought to take exception to his bringing in a Bill of this kind. The House would have plenty of work to do, quite enough to engage their utmost attention, without this Bill of the noble Lord. If the noble Lord had proposed to bring in a Bill not to repeal but to amend that section of the Act of Anne, they might have a Committee upon it, for they all knew there were many anomalies, exaggerated by process of time, which it would be desirable to have removed, but which still were not of so exigent and pressing nature as to engross public attention at the present time. It struck him as somewhat singular that the very first Resolution of the Whole House in Committee, to which they had come unanimously, should have been for the convenience of place-men, and now the noble Lord desired to bring in a Bill for the convenience of men who wished to be place-men. He had no sympathy with the noble Lord in that attempt. He was strongly of opinion that the present Parliament would be quite as jealous of the privileges of the people as the former Parliament, and he ventured to think that the proposition of the noble Lord was repugnant to the spirit of the Constitution, and in direct contravention of the rights of those who had sent them there. It was an infringement of the privileges of the people, because if a man when chosen by the Crown to fill Office was not to go back to his constituents, what was that but saying that he was to be independent of them, since their consent was not to be taken as to whether he should or should not accept Office? Suppose, two or three years ago, when, as was notorious, Lord Derby applied for co-operation to a right hon.

Mr. White

Gentleman, a very conspicuous Member of the present Government, that right hon. Gentleman had accepted the offer, did the noble Lord mean to say that an appeal ought not to have been made to his constituents to ratify the proceeding? And yet if this Bill had been law at the time, no such appeal would have been necessary. The noble Lord seemed quite oblivious of a constant and wholesome principle of the British Constitution. When the statute of Anne was passed it should be recollected that they had triennial Parliaments, and yet our ancestors were so wisely jealous of the Constitutional privileges of the people, that they passed an Act that on the acceptance of Office under the Crown it should be necessary to appeal to the constituency. In the first place, the Crown was endowed with the right to choose whom it pleased for Office; and that being so, he held that the people had an equally undoubted right to say whether the men so chosen, if Members of this House, should continue to represent them. It was on that principle he opposed the introduction of this Bill, which he believed would do violence to a fundamental principle of our Constitution, and infringe the undoubted rights of the people. Suppose a man was chosen, as many were, because he happened to be independent, however consonant it might be with his own feelings to support the principles he was sent to represent when he became a Member of Government, yet there were constituencies which would not like to be represented by a person who was hampered by the acceptance of Office. If the Bill which the noble Lord asked leave to introduce should become law, he did not hesitate to say that in a Parliament of ordinary duration, it might, as Lord Lytton once remarked, prove a shelter to tergiversation and a shield to apostacy. The noble Lord might be enamoured of the Prerogative of the Crown, but he preferred to support the privileges of the people. He trusted he had not used unduly strong language, but he had been provoked by what had fallen from the noble Lord, who seemed to think any opposition to his unconstitutional proposal utterly unjustifiable.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he hoped he should not be considered presumptuous if, in the first stage of the discussion of this question, he ventured to express his decided—he hoped his noble Friend would excuse him for saying his vehement—dissent from the proposal before the House. The noble Lord had said that it was unusual to oppose a proposal of this kind in the first stage of the discussion. Whether it was unusual or not he did not know; but he was looking that day at the record of a Motion of a similar character made in the second year of the Reformed Parliament—when, upon the advice given by the sturdy common sense of Lord Althorpe, that Motion was negatived in its inception. His noble Friend (Viscount Bury) was not in the usual position of a Member introducing a measure like many of those which had been introduced this Session, upon questions which everybody admitted ought to be dealt with, and where the difference of opinion was only as to the manner in which they ought to be disposed of. He (Mr. Harcourt), for one, was not ready to admit that this was a question which required to be dealt with. He could not forget that this was a Bill to abrogate a principle which was coeval with—he might almost say congenital with—our present system of Parliamentary Government. The principle was established when, after the Revolution of 1688, the relations between the Crown and the House of Commons, and between the House of Commons and the people, were settled upon a permanent footing. Therefore, he thought that the onus of proof lay on his noble Friend—although he had disclaimed it that night—to show that there was some cause for disturbing a settlement which had now existed for a period of nearly two centuries. The noble Lord had thought himself altogether dispensed from advancing any argument on which to support his proposal; but it seemed to him (Mr. Harcourt) that it needed a great deal of argument to induce the House of Commons to entertain it even at its first stage. There could be no question that originally this principle of the Constitution was introduced as a safeguard against the power of the Crown. Fortunately for them, in the generation in which they now lived, the jealousy of the power of the Crown had been disarmed by the conduct of the Sovereign. For many years past the fear which at one time was so sensitively alive in the minds of the English people had disappeared altogether; they had been so accustomed to a scrupulous fidelity in the observance of the principles of the Constitution on the part of the reigning Sovereign, that some persons had come to think the safeguards of the English Constitution wholly unnecessary. But it seemed to him that that was not a conclusive reason why these safeguards should be wholly abolished in the future. When they spoke of the Crown everybody knew that they did not mean the personal influence or authority of the Sovereign—they meant a great deal more; they meant the personal influence and authority of the Executive Government; when they spoke of the Speech from the Throne they knew that they were speaking of the Speech of the Administration, and of the policy of the Government of the day; and it was because the provisions of the statute of Anne were a safeguard against the power of the Executive, that it seemed to him quite as necessary at the present moment as at any former period of our history that they should be religiously preserved and jealously maintained. The history of that Act was probably familiar to all the Members of that House. In the original Act for the Settlement of the Crown a provision was made that all Ministers of the Crown should, after the accession of the House of Brunswick, be excluded absolutely from the House of Commons. In the fourth year of the reign of Queen Anne—when the terms of the Act for regulating the Succession to the Crown were re-settled—it was proposed by the House of Lords, which in those days was a Liberal Assembly, that this provision should be done away. At that period the Tory party in the House of Commons—under the guidance, he imagined, of Lord Bolingbroke—insisted on putting in a provision by which all Ministers of the Crown should be excluded from the House of Commons; and they were joined on that occasion by a section of the Whig party—he supposed a Whig “cave”; but they failed in carrying their project; and the settlement which now formed the statute of Anne was the result of a compromise which passed both Houses of Parliament, and ever since that period it had regulated the relations between the Crown and the House of Commons. It was by the happy accident of that arrangement that they had escaped the condition of things which now exists in America,—an example which, certainly, the recent experience of America led them to rejoice that they had not followed. The principle laid down in the Act which his noble Friend proposed to repeal was this:—That the choice by the Sovereign of her Ministers should be ratified by the people as represented by the constituencies who elected them. That was a principle which for a century and a half had been fundamental in the English Constitution; and he confessed that he was at a loss to conceive what were the grounds on which the noble Lord proposed that it should be changed. There had been practical inconveniences, no doubt, in particular Ministers who were moved from one Office to another having to go back to their constituents; but those inconveniences were removed by the Act of 1867, to which both Houses of Parliament gave their entire assent. What, however, his noble Friend proposed was a totally different thing—namely, that a change of Government should take place without any form of appeal to the people for their approval of the new Administration. Now, he ventured to say that although fear of the influence and power of the Crown had disappeared from the minds of the English people, there remained a danger quite as great—indeed, still more formidable—and that was the danger, within the House of Commons itself, of political cabal and Parliamentary intrigue. There was no event which happened in a free country so important as a change of Administration. There was nothing which was of more urgent importance than that they should guard against a change of Government which was not the result of an alteration of policy, but the effect merely of personal combinations; and it was in such a statute as that of Anne that they had a real protection against the spirit of Parliamentary intrigue; because there was an appeal under it from Parliamentary combination to the people outside as represented by the constituencies who were asked to re-elect the Members who were to form the new Government. The statute operated practically like a small dissolution of Parliament. He had been reading the other day in the Memoirs of the late Sir Robert Peel, published by his executors, a memorandum, in which he gave the reasons why he dissolved Parliament in 1834 when he had taken Office with a party which was in a minority in the House of Commons. Sir Robert Peel said that one of the considerations which drove him to that dissolution was the fact that under the operation of this very statute of Anne his Government must have gone to the constituencies. That, it seemed to him, was a very important argument in favour of the existence of such a provision. They all knew that Governments in a minority were not always very easily driven to a dissolution; and as it had been placed on record by the late Sir Robert Peel that having taken Office in the peculiar circumstances which attended the formation of his Government in 1834 the necessity of the re-election of his Cabinet led him to a conclusion in favour of dissolving Parliament, that was, he thought, a very strong reason why they should not now dispense with so valuable a safeguard for their protection under similar circumstances. But they need not go so far back as 1834 for evidence of the value of such an Act. There were circumstances even more recent than those of the year 1834, to which he should hardly have ventured to allude had they not been already referred to by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White). There were cases in which a section of a party might sever itself from its own political connections on a great question of policy and might join the opposite party in Parliament. Now that section might, on a change of Government, take Office, or it might not. Probably the latter alternative might be the more prudent one. But supposing that persons who had severed themselves in action from their own party were to take Office by what was ordinarily called a coalition with a party that was opposed to them—he wanted to know whether their constituents were not entitled to express their opinion on the course they had pursued? And if the statute of Anne had operated before and might operate again to prevent such combinations as these, it seemed to him that it was a useful statute, and one with which they could not afford to dispense. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) had alluded to the question of short Parliaments. Now, he did not know whether that was a question which was to be soon raised; but if his noble Friend (Viscount Bury) should succeed in carrying his Bill, that circumstance would afford the strongest argument for short Parliaments which he could possibly conceive. But they need not go back far for reasons in favour of the existing condition of things. What had happened within the last few months should be sufficient to satisfy them that the present law was one which they ought to desire to preserve. Why, they had had a change of Government within the last three months; and, except the Ministerial explanations which had been given at the hustings, there had been no official explanation rendered to Parliament or the country of the causes which had led to that change of Government. They had seen, indeed, a sort of semi-official circular from the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, addressed to the Members of his own party; but that was not what was generally understood by a "Ministerial explanation." Parliament opened, and there was no Ministerial explanation from the Government of the change which had occurred or of the policy which was to be pursued; and the only explanation which the country had received had been from the Ministers upon the hustings. Some of those explanations were of a very important character. He thought his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary (Mr. Bruce), on the hustings at Renfrewshire, used some expressions on the subject of the Ballot which cast a light on a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which otherwise might have been less intelligible than it was. There were other instances in which he was quite sure the House and the country at large would have been sorry to lose the public statements which this statute secured on the occasion of a change of Government. He might refer to an event which had given profound satisfaction to the country, and also, he believed, to both sides of the House of Commons—namely, the acceptance of the responsibilities of Office by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham. Now, he wanted to know, would not everybody have deeply regretted if, under these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman had had no constitutional opportunity of stating to his constituents at Birmingham the view he took of his new position, and of giving to the country at large and to those who, both in and out of the House of Commons, had followed his teaching, an assurance that the same principles which he had enforced as a leader of the people he intended to act upon as a Minister of the Crown? Why, then, should the noble Lord endeavour to deprive persons in the situation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham of an opportunity of making those explanations which the Constitution approved, and which certainly in his (Mr. Harcourt's) belief tended very much to the satisfaction of the people? He had to thank the House for the indulgence with which they had heard him; and, in conclusion, he would venture to ask the noble Lord to consider the grave and weighty words of warning addressed by the historian of the Constitution to our generation. Mr. Hallam, after giving a history of the origin of the statute of Queen Anne, and after blaming the original terms of the Act of Settlement, and approving the final compromise upon which they were arranged, went on to say in reference to these very sections of the statute—

"These restrictions ought to be rigorously and jealously maintained, and to receive a construction in doubtful cases according to their constitutional spirit, not as if they were of a penal nature towards individuals—an absurdity in which the careless and indulgent spirit of modern times might sometimes acquiesce." — [Constitutional History, chap. xv.]

He felt assured his noble Friend would not suspect him of any disrespect towards him if he ventured to protest against what Lord Castlereagh would have called an "ignorant impatience" of small inconveniences when dealing with great constitutional principles. The principle involved in the statute of Anne he regarded as part of the essential and living fabric of the Constitution. His noble Friend, however, appeared to be dealing with it as if it were some old sword which having been a long time in the family, was of no further use, and which might, therefore, be sold off to some old curiosity shop. But he (Mr. Harcourt), for one, did not look at the statute from that point of view. It had done great service, and he believed it might do great service again. It was the sword of our fathers, and it was our duty to keep it bright and burnished as we had received it from our ancestors. While sailing on a calm and unruffled sea we ought not to confine our thoughts solely to the present because it seemed prosperous; but we should make provision also for the future, when a political tempest might arise, and, following the advice of Mr. Hallam, jealously preserve those safeguards which our forefathers had provided—those safeguards which had proved hitherto, and might prove hereafter, alike a security for the stability of the Throne and for the liberties of the people.

MR. LOCKE KING said, that while agreeing with the opinions expressed by the last speaker, he wished to remark that his hon. and learned Friend and the hon. Member for Brighton had revived a very inconvenient practice in that House. The custom of discussing the merits of Bills which hon. Members had not yet seen used to prevail in the House many years ago, and few Members had suffered more than he had from Bills being thrown out before they were brought in. Of late years, however, the practice had grown up of allowing Members who had taken the trouble of drawing up Bills the privilege of having them printed, and so giving hon. Members the opportunity of examining their contents. That privilege had, he believed, always been possessed by Members of the other House, where every Peer had simply to lay his Bill upon the table in order to insure its being printed and circulated. It would, in his judgment, be unfair to the noble Lord (Viscount Bury) to deprive him of the opportunity of having his Bill introduced and discussed after hon. Members had made themselves acquainted with the precise nature of its provisions. He trusted the House would allow the noble Lord to introduce his Bill, and then see what were its provisions.

COLONEL SYKES said, his hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) had anticipated him in the remarks he was about to address to the House. His experience justified him in saying that it was a waste of time to discuss a Bill before hon. Members had seen its details. But, putting this consideration aside, unquestionably the noble Lord's measure would deprive the people of a constitutional right of great value, and he was unable to bring himself to believe that one of the first acts of that House, which had been elected by the people, would be to deprive the people of an important right.

MR. HENLEY said, he would not detain the House more than a moment, for

he thought that the first stage of a measure was undoubtedly a very inconvenient one to raise a discussion on it; but as the general question had been partly raised and commented upon, he could only repeat what he had said on several previous occasions—namely, that he did not like cutting the connection between the House of Commons and the people. The House went far enough—and indeed farther than he thought right—in what they did a year or two ago. And as far as this measure was concerned, as the present Parliament might be kept together for six or seven years, surely the people had a right to express their opinion if during that period a change should occur in the governing power of the country. It would, he thought, be a great calamity if a great change were made in those constitutional principles which had been so admirably set forth by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), and he took this opportunity of congratulating the House on their having so sound a constitutional authority among them. He should be sorry to see any measure passed that would abrogate those principles which, in his opinion, were soundly laid down when the Act of Parliament passed in the reign of Queen Anne.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that though no doubt this was an inconvenient stage at which to raise a discussion on a measure, yet greater inconvenience would arise if a Bill were allowed to be introduced when the majority of the House were opposed to its main principle, as he believed they were in the present instance. He thought it would be better to take the opinion of the House at once.

VISCOUNT BURY said, in reply, that the speeches of the hon. Members for Brighton and Oxford, excellent as they were, ought to have been made on the second reading of the Bill. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Vernon Harcourt) had, he thought, not traced quite accurately the history of the statute. In the first instance, the House of Commons introduced into the Act of Security a long clause enumerating various persons who should be eligible for a seat in the House of Commons. All persons whose offices were not named in the Act were to be absolutely excluded. The Bill was sent up to the House of Lords, and was by them rejected. Two or three conferences were held between the two Houses, and in the end the Lords compelled the Commons to give way; but a provision was inserted with the view of saving the dignity of the Commons, to the effect that any Member accepting any Office whatever under the Crown should acknowledge the supremacy of the House of Commons by vacating his seat. The original intention, therefore, of the House of Commons, in making this concession, was, not to save the rights of constituencies, but to adopt a roundabout way, since they were debarred from adopting the plain way, to prevent the Crown from creating too many placemen. Far from being a great constitutional safeguard invented by the deliberate wisdom of our ancestors, it was a compromise forced upon them by the superior power of the House of Lords. Now, in his opinion, the present practice was very inconvenient, and productive of much waste of valuable time. Suppose, for example, a Government was defeated in the middle of June. In such a case there would be very little time available for the passing of the necessary legislation of the Session; and yet the Prime Minister, after spending at least three weeks in getting together his Cabinet, was obliged to go down to his constituency again for re-election. He maintained that this custom was not such a constitutional safeguard as the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had described it to be. Why should the House delegate to a single constituency—such as Tiverton, for example—the duty of deciding whether the man selected by the Crown for its Prime Minister was a fitting person to hold that high position. Surely the House of Commons ought to retain in its own hands the right of deciding such a question. Long before the Minister could have been re-elected by his constituency—or, it might be, rejected, in which event another complexity would arise—the House of Commons might itself have determined, on a Motion of Want of Confidence, whether the Prime Minister ought to remain in Office. They had had recent experience of the inconvenience of the existing system. He hoped the House would allow him to lay the Bill on the table for the purpose of discussion.

MR. GLADSTONE: My noble Friend (Viscount Bury) is certainly as well entitled as any man to ask at the hands of the House any courtesy which the House is accustomed to accord; because those who remember my noble Friend at former periods when he was a Member of this House—to which I am exceedingly glad he has returned—know very well that there is no man more competent to do full justice to the cause he has undertaken. But I think there has been a disposition on the part of some Members rather to overstate the extent to which the practice of the House is carried with respect to the introduction of Bills as an act of courtesy to individual Members. When a Bill contains details of a complicated character, bearing one upon another, and depending upon minute terms of expression, or even when anything that is serious may be said to depend upon the mode in which the measure may be drawn and its purposes expressed, then there is very great convenience in allowing the introduction of the Bill and deferring the objection that any one may be disposed to take to its principles; but when a Bill raises a point which is perfectly and absolutely simple, and which really involves no more than saying “Aye” or “No” in answer to a particular question, undoubtedly, so far as my knowledge and recollection go, it cannot be said to be the general, far less the uniform, practice of the House to allow the introduction of the Bill which it is seriously intended to contest on the second reading. Take, for example, the well-known cases of Bills for the introduction of Vote by Ballot. I believe I am correct in saying that, in very many instances, it has been the practice to contest the introduction of these Bills without waiting for the second reading; and that if, upon any occasion, a Bill has been introduced, and a division taken on the second reading, it has been due to the state of the House at the moment when the Motion was made, and the view taken, by the opponents of the measure, of the policy of postponing discussion, rather than to any general admission that a measure proposed seriously by a Member competent to do justice to it ought, as a matter of course, to be laid on the table; and upon this occasion we must feel that the discussion, though not a prolonged one, has, notwithstanding, taken the form of a discussion upon the principle of the Bill. My noble Friend (Viscount Bury) has stated well many arguments which can be urged on each side of the question, and both my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton and the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, who addressed the House with so much ability, and in a manner to lead us to entertain such great expectations in regard to his future contributions to our debates, have entered so far into the question that I own I think it would be a waste of time if on this occasion we were to vote upon anything except the principle of the measure. There are, no doubt, some inconveniences attending the operation of the existing law; but I cannot doubt, and I believe it is a conviction shared by both sides of the House, that after the settlement arrived at two years ago, it is premature to re-open the question; and I would therefore recommend my noble Friend not to press the House to a division on this occasion.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he saw it would be useless to go to a division, and he therefore withdrew his Motion.

LOCAL TAXATION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

SIR MASSEY LOPES, in rising to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the present amount, incidence, and effect of Local Taxation, with a view to a more equitable readjustment of these burdens—”

said, he felt his responsibility in introducing so difficult and complicated a question was not in any degree diminished since he brought it forward last year, for it had engrossed public attention during the last twelve months, and had been alluded to in almost every election address and hustings speech. There was scarcely any candidate who did not admit the existence of a grievance and pledge himself to do his best to remedy it. He did not take credit for originating the question, because it was brought forward twenty years ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and had been dealt with by other influential Members; but he had these advantages over his predecessors—there was but little rivalry and jealousy between the different classes and interests of the country at present, and therefore the matter could be discussed with greater temper and moderation than before, and by organization and united action legitimate influence had been brought to bear on the Government of the country. Within the last year or two the recently established Chambers of Agriculture had progressed marvellously, and they were calculated, not only to exercise a beneficial influence, but also to reflect credit on the industry with which they were connected. There had been no agitation, no indignation meetings, no attempt to set class against class, but any one who, like himself, had attended their meetings and taken part in their discussions must acknowledge the ability which had been displayed, and commend the moderation of language, the impartiality of tone and temper, which had characterized their proceedings. If it had not been for the assistance he had received from the Chambers, he would not have presumed to have brought this very difficult and complicated question before the House. A proof of the interest taken in it was the almost universal demand for County Financial Boards, which he had advocated from the first, believing that it was a sound constitutional principle that the ratepayers who found the money should at all events have a voice in its expenditure, although it was a question whether the Boards would be able to effect any appreciable diminution in the county expenditure unless the objects of it were limited. No one was more adverse to class legislation than himself, and he did not bring this question forward in the interest of any one class, for the interest of all classes were indissolubly connected, and to favour one class at the expense of another was not only in his opinion unjust and impolitic, but prejudicial to the public interest. To make the question of local taxation more intelligible he would say a few words upon the general taxation of the country, Imperial as well as local, with reference to its incidence and amount. In round numbers they levied in general taxation and spent on Imperial purposes the sum of £70,000,000 a year, while something like £20,000,000 a year was levied besides in local taxation. The general taxation might be divided into three grades: first, there were the Customs, Excise, Stamps, &c., which were indirect taxes levied in an imperceptible manner, and produced something like £60,000,000 a year; next, there was the Income Tax, which was direct, and was levied from a limited and wealthier class upon an annual income of £313,000,000, and at 6*d.* in the pound produced about £9,000,000. Those two grades were Imperial and national, levied for Imperial and national purposes, and to these purposes real property paid its fair quota. He now came to the third grade, which was local taxation. We levied by local taxation £20,000,000 a year, and this sum was levied from one description of property, which amounted in the whole to £93,000,000 of net annual income. This was also a direct tax, and from it there was no escape—no means of evasion. It was raised wholly, solely, and exclusively from one description of property, namely, real property (lands and houses), from one-seventh of the total annual income of the country, and from less than one-third of that which paid income tax. Local taxation was of two classes. There was, first, the local taxation levied for Imperial or general purposes, the poor rate, the police rate, and the maintenance of justice, &c. Then there was, secondly, that portion which was more purely local—that which was levied for the especial benefit of that property on which it was expended—paving, lighting, sewerage, &c. But the whole of the local taxation of the country was levied under the name of poor rate, and it was raised solely from real property, consisting of lands and houses; yet fully one-third of the amount so raised was diverted from the support of the poor and applied to other purposes. These purposes were miscellaneous and multifarious. He contended, therefore, that the name “poor rate” was a delusive expression. This rate was not in reality a single rate, but an accumulation of rates—a heterogeneous and incongruous mass of charges. He would endeavour to particularize some of them. There were the poor rate, with establishments charges, county rate, charges for lunatics, vaccination, registration, highways, police, administration of justice, expenses of gaols, coroners, and weights and measures, &c. His Motion had reference to the amount, incidence, and effect of the present system of local taxation, and he proposed to say a few words on each of these heads. He would like to have considered the principle, but he maintained that the present system was totally devoid of any principle, and that it was impossible to justify it on any principle of equity, law, or political economy. The whole amount levied for Imperial taxation was £70,000,000; the amount levied for local taxation £20,000,000. To show the increased and increasing amount of local taxation he would compare the first year, for which we had any reliable statistics on this subject, with some recent years. In 1776 the total amount levied was £1,720,000, of which, £1,556,000 belonged to the poor rate, and £164,000 to county and other purposes, while in 1867 the figures were—poor rate, £6,959,000; county and other rates, £3,945,000; total, £10,905,000. These figures showed, therefore, that 180 years after the Act of Elizabeth the rate levied for county and other purposes amounted to only £164,000. Ninety years afterwards the total amount had increased 534 per cent.; the poor rate amount, 347 per cent; and the county and other rates, 2,305 per cent. Again, taking a shorter period—of thirty years, from 1837 to 1867—he found that in 1837 the total amount levied was £5,294,000, the item for poor rate being £4,044,000, and that for county and other rates being £1,250,000; and compared with the figures for 1867, as just given, it showed an increase in the total amount levied of 100 per cent, of the poor rate of 70 per cent., and of the county rates 200 per cent. Taking a still shorter period of six years—1861 to 1867—he found that the total amount levied was £2,302,000, showing an increase of 30 per cent for poor rates—£1,181,000—or 20 per cent. increase; and for county rates, £1,329,000, or 50 per cent increase. Comparing 1866 with 1867—the last year for which there were any published Returns—the figures showed that in 1866 the total was £9,989,000, with £6,439,000 for poor, and £3,550,000 for county and other rates, giving a total increase of £1,000,000, the increase on poor-rate being 8 per cent, and that on other charges 11 per cent. The Returns for the present year had not yet been published; but he thought that when they were published they would show a proportionate increase, because it appeared that whereas on the 1st of January, 1867, there were 963,000 persons chargeable on the poor rate, in January, 1868, there were 1,040,000 persons so chargeable. We had, therefore, one in every nineteen of the population chargeable on the poor

rate, or, in other words, exclusively chargeable on one description of property—namely, real property, while the greater proportion, the bulk of the income and property of the country, went scot free, and contributed scarcely anything. Of the £20,000,000 levied by way of local taxation, £8,000,000 were raised for rates, taxes, tolls, and dues. To this amount the charge of land tax might be fairly added, besides £11,000,000 for poor rate and county rate. The amount raised by rates, taxes, tolls, &c., had increased £1,000,000 last year, and the debt £3,500,000. The total amount now reached £21,000,000 at least, exclusive of tithes, and this was raised from £93,000,000 of net annual income. The amount raised just now for the whole of our Imperial taxation was £70,000,000. If from those £70,000,000 we took £28,000,000, which went to pay the interest on debt, we had £42,000,000 raised for Imperial purposes, whereas we were raising £21,000,000 for local taxation. Then the £70,000,000 were raised from the United Kingdom—England, Ireland, and Scotland—while the £21,000,000 were raised in England and Wales alone. Was it not a glaring injustice that one description of property should be taxed at the rate of 2s. or 2s. 6d. in the pound, while all other descriptions paid nothing whatever? Could such a system be defended upon any legal principle? Was it in accordance with equity, with sound principles of political economy, or with the principles of right and wrong which governed the ordinary transactions of life? It might be said that the old Act of Elizabeth afforded some justification for the anomaly; but how did the facts stand? The poor rate was the oldest tax in this country, with the exception of the church rate, which he might remind the House had been so recently abolished. Up to the reign of Henry VIII. the poor were maintained by voluntary contributions, distributed by means of monasteries and religious houses, and when those establishments were abolished by Henry VIII. every man was expected and admonished to relieve the indigent according to his ability. The 43rd of Elizabeth was the first Act which empowered churchwardens and overseers to levy compulsory assessments upon real property, and by that Act those persons were instructed to rate every inhabitant according to his ability. The only practicable mode at that time was to rate the net annual value of visible property. Land and houses was the property then particularized, the only source of wealth, and, therefore, best any only test and measure of a man's ability. Funded property, or capitalized wealth, did not then exist to any appreciable amount, and on that account was not particularized. These were good reasons for limiting the relief of the poor to land—because land not only represented the entire wealth of the nation, but employed the entire population. But what was the case now? Was land at the present moment the only test of a man's wealth? On the contrary, the income derived from land only amounted to one-seventh of the whole income of the country, and land only employed one-fourteenth of the whole population of the country. Therefore the good reasons which existed in Elizabeth's time for taxing land solely for the relief of the poor did not now exist. He must also remind the House that, in comparatively later days, the Court of Queen's Bench having determined that stock-in-trade was liable to be assessed to the relief of the poor, Parliament had passed an annual Act since 1840 to prevent stock-in-trade being rated for that purpose. That exemption of one particular property from the tax was most unjust, as it threw an unjust share of the burdens on real property. Although he did not think it desirable that stock-in-trade should be taxed for that purpose, because such a tax would be of an inquisitorial nature, and therefore most unpopular, he demanded that some relief should be given to land from the additional burden thus thrown upon it by property legally liable to the tax being exempted from its operation. He considered there was still stronger claims for consideration. If he admitted, for the sake of argument, that real property by the law of Elizabeth was exclusively liable to the relief of the poor, he would ask how many of the other objects for which rates are now levied were ever contemplated by that Act? How many modern burdens had the Legislature added beyond the original contract? Had not real property, therefore, a right to ask for a limitation of poor rate to its ancient and original obligations? He would enumerate only a few of the additional charges placed on the poor's rate assessment during the last few years:—Registration of births and deaths imposed in 1838, £74,000; vaccination, 1841, £44,000; lunatics, 1844, £607,000; police, county and borough, 1856, £2,511,000; highways, 1863, £595,000; with turnpikes and education rates looming in the distance. Before the year 1846, no doubt, the possessors of land derived some advantage from the protective duties which in a degree compensated them for the burdens they had to bear. When those duties were abolished, Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel, who represented the two sides of the House at that time, stated that if a Free Trade policy were to be adopted it would only be just and right that some of the burdens peculiar to land should be removed. And what compensation had the landowners received for the losses they had sustained in consequence of the adoption of a Free Trade policy? Have they any exclusive privileges or exemptions? If so, give them even-handed justice, and he should be glad to see them abolished. True it was that in 1846 some slight changes in the local taxation were effected for their relief, but since that time the expenses of registration, of vaccination, of the maintenance of lunatics, of the police, and several other charges had been thrown upon real property. The whole world was now brought into direct competition with the tillers of our soil. If they are to hold their own, you must mete out even-handed justice to this important branch of industry and enterprise. It has to compete with countries where the climate is far superior, where land and labour are cheap, and where taxes are comparatively unknown. Again, it did seem absurd that when in these days of Reform the whole system of our Imperial taxation had been altered within the last thirty years, we were basing the whole of our local taxation on the Act of Elizabeth, passed 300 years ago. He might illustrate the injustice under which the landowners laboured by taking the case of two men, each possessed of a capital of £10,000, the one investing his property in the funds or other securities of capitalized wealth—and living, probably, in a lodging—and the other either purchasing land or sinking his capital in the means and appliances for farming land. The first man lived in selfish enjoyment, fruges consumere natus, while the other was engaged in increasing the produce of the earth, and thus in benefiting the community. The income of the one was safe and certain—without deduction or risk. He received it without wear or tear either of mind or body. The income of the other was subject to many contingencies—inclement weather, rinderpest, &c., and was at least precarious; moreover, it was acquired by anxious care, unremitting toil, and by the sweat of his brow. Both men enjoyed the same protection, the same security for their persons and property, by means of the poor rate, police rate, and the administration of justice. Both had the same use of the roads, and if bad, both had equal power to indict them. One paid more than his fair share towards these burdens; the other paid comparatively nothing. This was an unjust privilege, and an impolitic exemption. The result of the present system was to compel paupers to maintain pauperism—to compel men renting cottages of the value of £3 or £4 per annum to maintain those who were but little worse off than themselves, while those who had thousands a year derived from personal property were not required to pay a farthing to the poor rates. He submitted that this was a great hardship and injustice, as many of these poor men when summoned for non payment of rates, and pleading their inability, could not but be aware that some of those who were adjudicating upon them had evaded their liability and the spirit and intention of our Law that “every man should contribute according to his ability.” The present system of local taxation appeared to him to be not only unjust but impolitic, and detrimental to the public interest, since it tended to discourage industry and paralyze enterprise. It withdrew capital from the land, which was diverted into other channels both at home and abroad, because they offered better promise of investment; it tended to diminish the produce of the country, since by diverting capital from the land it limited the employment of labour and thereby increased pauperism. It was an alarming and deplorable fact that the country was deriving so much of its income from funds lent to foreign countries, at the same time strengthening those countries, while by the same process this country was being weakened. The amount of capital invested in farming was far below its wants. Thousands of acres in this country were starving for want of improvement; while, at the same time, there were thousands of the population starving for want of employment. There were thousands of acres of land that might be profitably reclaimed and cultivated, but what inducements were given to effect that result? If an occupier tried to improve his land, to make it worth 30s. an acre instead of 10s., the assessment committee were down upon him directly, and increased his original burdens. They, in fact, levied another income tax of 10 or 12 per cent upon him, on the ground that he had improved his land, although before his capital was invested in land it did not pay a farthing towards local taxation. That was a great hardship and discouragement to an enterprising tenant, while it was a bonus to the indolent. He should be told that this was a landlord's question; but he would now show how injuriously it affected house property. Every Member of that House who represented a borough must know how prejudicially house property in towns was affected by excessive local taxation. What inducement was given to landowners to improve and erect better dwellings for the working classes? The effect of this heavy local taxation on house property was to overcrowd families in one room in a most indecent and indelicate manner. It not only tended to the demoralization of the mind, but to disease of the body. At present it did not pay to erect and improve the dwellings of the poor; but if there were some little remission of local burdens, a greater inducement would be given to erect a better class of dwellings. House property was, indeed, more affected than land by the existing heavy local burdens. He found that by the last Returns of house property the gross annual income of house property was rated at £62,000,000 a year, whereas land was only rated at £46,000,000 a year. Suppose a man had £1,000 to invest, and doubted whether he should put it into land or house property. If he put it into land, he only expected to get 3 per cent; but if he invested it in house property, he expected 7 per cent. or 8 per cent for his money. It was clear that in the latter case he paid much more local taxation than the man whose capital only brought him 3 per cent. He should be told that this was a landlord's tax, and that the landlord and not the occupier would get the benefit of any remission of local taxation. He would for the sake of argument admit this to be true but why should the consideration of what was right and just be influenced by looking solely at the particular party to be benefited by a righteous and impartial adjustment? He took it for granted that the general feeling was against landlords; but he would ask the House to have some consideration for other classes. There was a large body of yeomen in this country who farmed their own estates. There was also the numerous and influential class of freeholders who lived in their own houses. If the House had no consideration for landlords, had they none for persons who were the backbone of the country, but who were gradually being reduced both in their numbers and circumstances? Many of these yeomen and freeholders derived their estates from previous generations, and when they were asked why they parted with their land, their answer was that the burdens upon land had so much increased that it was impossible profitably to farm their own property, and that they sold their ancestral estates in order to invest their money in more remunerative pursuits. The next objection that might be made was, that although local burdens had increased yet the value of property and houses had also increased. No doubt it had increased, but how? The union assessment had increased the rateable value of property, but he doubted whether it had increased the intrinsic value. The Union Assessment Act was a very good measure for increasing the income tax, but it tended in every parish to raise the rateable value of every estate proportionately to the value of the highest, and it never brought it down again. Admitting, however, that the value of the land had been increased to the extent of the local burdens, it had been done by the investment, not only by the owners but the occupiers, of capital, which previously to its investment had not paid one farthing towards these burdens. If, however, the owners and occupiers of land were to cease to invest their capital, the rateable value of real property would diminish instead of increasing. He should, no doubt, be told that the landlords had a great advantage in the land tax, that they obtained a permanent commutation of land tax at a valuation now inadequate by the Act of William and Mary, 1692. If hon. Gentlemen would refer to the language of the first Act creating the land tax, they would find, that although called a land tax it was intended to be a tax on personal as well as upon real property. But reading the statutes somewhat further on they would find as regarded personal property, that first a portion in 1825 and ultimately the remainder was exempted from the land tax in 1833; and the exemption was attended with the further hardship, that the owners and occupiers, already subjected to their legitimate proportion of land tax, were obliged to pay the quota which ought to be contributed by the owners of personal property as well. Between 1866 and 1867 the poor rates and county rates increased £1,000,000. By whom was that paid, the owners or the occupiers? Would any Gentleman rise in his place and say that he allowed from his rents an abatement corresponding to the amount of increased taxes paid by his tenants? And if not, was it not folly to call this an owner's as distinguished from an occupier's tax? What was the meaning of the demand so generally made on the part of the occupiers throughout England for County Financial Boards? Would they evince such a strong interest in the supervision of expenditure if they themselves were not called upon to contribute to it? How to redress the evils complained of was a difficult problem, but he believed not insuperable. What was needed was a system of equitable taxation, combined with a system of local administration. No man valued more highly than he did the powers, privileges, and advantages of self-government; the benefits resulting from local management and supervision, which he regarded as the only system able to prevent extravagance, and to combine economy with efficiency. But without sacrificing the principle of local self-government, he thought there were certain advantages capable of being combined with its working. It was the business of independent Members to state a grievance, and of the Executive to find a remedy; but he ventured to suggest a mode by which some remission from the burdens complained of might be granted.

Why not take away from the poor rate and county rate burdens which had recently been placed upon them—such as the police, lunatics, maintenance of justice, highways, vaccination, registration, and other charges of a like nature? These were all national purposes and national obligations, from which the community at large derived as much benefit as the owners of real property. Did not the owner of personal property require, for instance, the protection of the police quite as much as the owners of estates? He made equal use of the roads, and the same remedies were open to him in case the roads were bad as to those who paid for their construction and maintenance. Year by year the Executive Government were acquiring and exercising greater power in all these matters, being able to apply a very substantial threat—namely, that if their recommendations were not acted upon, the allowance of one-fourth, or whatever it might be, which was made by the State, would be no longer continued. In Poor Law matters the Government now went into minutiae—examining the dietary and prescribing the quantities of gruel and of soup. If they took so much power into their own hands they ought also to take some of the responsibility, and give a larger amount of assistance from the national funds than was at present afforded. As a principle of abstract justice, it might be said that the national poor ought to be maintained by the assessment of every description of property; but this might be considered too radical and too revolutionary a measure. Half a loaf, however, was better than no bread, and he was quite prepared to accept a compromise. The best means of satisfying the public mind upon all these questions, and those also who felt themselves aggrieved, was by a full, fair, and impartial inquiry, which he hoped the Government would grant. For that purpose he considered a Royal Commission preferable to a Select Committee. They were all anxious to drag this question out of the arena of party politics, and, whatever might be the composition of a Committee of the House of Commons, it was always difficult to divest it of a party character. A Royal Commission, moreover, would enable them to enlarge the area of selection by appointing Members of the other House of Parliament, and practical men not in Parliament, who had given time and attention to the subject. A Commission would not only be the more impartial tribunal, but its deliberations were likely to lead more promptly to legislation, for the amount of Public and Private Business to be disposed of in the present Session rendered it well-nigh impossible that a sufficient number of Members of the House would give undivided attention to the subject. Committees of both Houses had already very fully considered this subject. In 1850 there was a Committee of the House of Lords, presided over by Lord Portman, which affirmed the principle that the "relief of the poor was a national obligation, and that every description of property should contribute to it." He wanted to advance a step further; and therefore he urged the Government to grant a Royal Commission in order to a full and impartial investigation. That was the only course which would command the confidence of the country, and lead to a satisfactory settlement of this long-vexed and very difficult question. And now, in conclusion, he must thank the House for the patience and kind indulgence with which they had listened to him. He might have failed to do justice to the subject he had undertaken; but he had implicit faith in the strength of his case and in the justice of those who had to adjudicate upon it. This was no sentimental grievance—it was a real and substantial one. All must admit that taxation was an evil—it was a necessary one; but any undue proportion of taxation thrown upon any particular class or interest was not only an evil, it was an unmitigated curse—a national disaster, for it tended to blight and paralyze that interest. In these days they heard much of equality; but in his opinion equality was a less pre-eminent consideration than equity; and in nothing was equity or equality more valuable than in the matter of taxation. He asked no favours, no privileges, no exemptions; he only asked a fair tribunal and a full and impartial investigation of their grievances. And to induce the Government to accede to their wishes, he must remind them of the pledge that was given through Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell—by both sides of the House—that when they had adopted the policy of Free Trade, it would be only just and right that a policy of Free Trade should be accompanied by a policy of Fair Taxation. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving his Motion.

MR. READ said, he could have wished that the task of seconding the Motion had fallen on some Gentleman on the other side of the House; because this was not a party question—it was not a question of town or country, but one affecting all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. He had been selected to second this Motion because he happened to be this year Chairman of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, and had in that capacity the honour and privilege of introducing an influential deputation to the Prime Minister on the subject. They had been received with that kindness and courtesy which the right hon. Gentleman always extended to those who approached him on Public Business. He took great pains to ascertain the whole of their views; he was good enough to say they had put their case fairly and moderately before him, and informed them their case should have the earnest consideration of himself and his Colleagues. He was quite sure that was not an empty phrase to send them away, but that they should have that consideration from the Government which had been promised. After the very able and lucid statement of the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) it would be impertinent to go over the ground he had so well trodden, but he might be allowed to make one or two supplementary remarks. No doubt they would be met by the cuckoo cry that this was a question for the landlords only. That rural ghost had been raised on so many occasions it had ceased to frighten the most ignorant agriculturist. Whenever the farmers asked anything from the Legislature this was the answer they received; if they called for a repeal of the malt tax, they were told the profits would go into the pockets of the landlords. In his opinion all restrictions and burdens on land were hindrances to the production of food, which was the primary and most substantial wealth of any nation; and, therefore, all those burdens and restrictions that could be ought to be removed. If farmers, in the first instance, gained some pecuniary advantage by the remission of either local or Imperial taxation, they could not expect to keep it all to themselves; they were very willing that the consumers of what they produced, as well as the labourer and the landlord, should share the profit with them. The theory of hiring land was this:—A tenant went to a landlord and said—"There are certain burdens on the land, and I must give you, in consequence of these burdens, so much less rent." That was the theory, and it was also the practice; but who paid during the tenure any increase of those burdens? Most certainly the tenant. During the last thirty years poor rates in this country had doubled. Rents had risen, and, therefore, the tenant had paid the increase. Although land might have risen in value, yet common agricultural land which had not been improved by the investment of either the tenant's or landlord's capital, or which was not benefited by the development of some trade or manufacture, or by the neighbourhood of a railroad, was not of more saleable value than it was thirty years ago. Only a very few years ago he hired the farm he now occupied, and already he was paying nearly 25 per cent more in rates than his predecessor, and, as he had no anticipation of leaving his farm, in all probability he should continue to pay that increase during the term of his natural life. They were told they had better leave well alone, for, though they were burdened by local taxation, they had exemptions from Imperial taxation. Well, he was ready to have those exemptions considered. What were those exemptions? They escaped the duty on fire insurances; let that exemption, then, be done away with by the duty on fire insurances being abolished altogether. Then, the farmers had paid no tax on agricultural horses. He said that the Government that would tax the motive power that would produce a bushel of wheat, must also tax the motive power that would produce a yard of calico. It was contended that they retained Protection in the shape of the 1s. of duty on imported corn. If that was a protective duty and not a fair import revenue, by all means rend away that miserable rag of Protection. He believed they would have from the great cities rather than from the farmers the cry of a return to Protection—what they wanted and asked was an extension of Free Trade. Then they were asked—"Did they wish their stock-in-trade to be assessed?" In the first place, he believed that, by the strict letter of the law, a farmer's stock-in-trade was now assessed. They said they did not wish to assess anybody's stock-in-trade, but they would be asked to pay a small contribution on their profits. A national rate was considered to be the question of the day, and they were told that local administration of a national fund must lead to extravagance, and that they would have jobbery and the worst kind of centralization. He admitted all this; but they did not ask for it. They simply asked for inquiry into all the incidents of local taxation, and left the remedy to the Royal Commission which they hoped the Government would give them. They had been asked why they did not suggest a remedy? He replied that they had suggested a remedy. They suggested a further contribution from the Consolidated Fund. But then up started a Gentleman who objected that Ireland and Scotland contributed to this Fund, and that, therefore, it would not be just to use the money for the benefit of the English only. Some other objections were made to that proposal, so they suggested that a property tax might offer a better and fairer means of providing the funds, and being easily divided between the three kingdoms. As to local extravagance, there were the Poor Law Board and the Home Office—the one to look over the guardians, the other to control the magistrates. If this were not enough he saw no particular objection to a Government Chairman of the Quarter Sessions or a Government Chairman of Poor Law Boards, should the State grant substantial aid. But if the poor rates went on increasing as they did, the burdens would become intolerable; £20,000,000 was now raised annually in local taxation. The hon. Baronet had divided the different items under two heads, but he (Mr. Read) would prefer to subdivide one of those divisions. He thought the police, the Militia, the gaols, the coroners, the weights and measures, and the vagrants altogether belonged entirely to the State; that they were connected more or less with the administration of justice, and it was the Consolidated Fund that should pay the whole of them. The magistrates who were employed to regulate these matters were the servants of the Crown; they had nothing to do with the ratepayers; and if the Government would furnish the money there would be no need of County Financial Boards. Under the second head came lunatics, paupers, vaccination, registration, and such like. It was the duty of every citizen to contribute to the extent of his ability, because the Poor Law was nothing more or less than a humane police rate, going on the principle that prevention was better than punishment. The law said no man should starve, which did away with the necessity of begging and stealing, and that was a protection to all property. The old Poor Law of Edward VI. empowered the parish officers to gently ask every man and woman for a contribution; but as that voluntary system did not answer, in the 43rd of Elizabeth it was enacted that every inhabitant should contribute to the relief of the poor according to his ability. There were two ways in which they could have these contributions in aid of rates—by a fixed portion from the State, or they might pay the establishment charges which were now fixed by the Poor Law Board, and some of them now partially paid by the Government. Under the third head he feared they would still have a large expenditure—rural highways (he did not mean turnpike roads), church rates, where they occurred, water supply, drainage, improvements, lighting, sewerage, and such like, must be a local charge. But he believed that a just and rigid inquiry would show that some remedy might yet be found by which wealth might be made to pay a little more and poverty a little less. It was said that there had been plenty of inquiry already, and that statement was undoubtedly correct; but the result was that but little had yet been done in favour of the agriculturists. In the days of Protection it might be right that the land should be exceptionally taxed. In 1850 the famous Committee of the House of Lords reported that all property should contribute towards the maintenance of the poor; but since that they had had the parish abolished, the area had been enlarged, but the worst was that no new property had been brought into the operation of those rates. To screw up all real property to bear the extraordinary force of local and imperial taxation, as proposed by the Bill of the President of the Poor Law Board, would in a measure increase rather than remedy the evils complained of. If all real property were fairly assessed the burden upon it could not not be quite equalized unless they were to adopt the American plan, by which the rates were levied on the profits rather than rental. He would take three farms, averaging 400 acres each, on each of which were employed thirty hands, and the profit on those farms might be called £300 a-year each, but the assessment was £600. He stepped into a neighbouring town and took three factories, employing 350 men, women, and children. The profits were reckoned at £3,000, and the average assessment to the poor rate was only £400. Besides which, the manufacturer might, in times of scarcity and distress, shut up his mill and pay just nothing. Then if they took the case of the artizan, earning 20s. a-week and spending 2s. 6d. a-week for rent. His cottage was at least assessed at £5, and he had all his borough, poor, and parochial charges to pay. The parochial clergy were taxed on every farthing of their income, and they were expected to pay double rates in respect of village charities, supporting schools, and in relieving the poor. There were many exceptions on real property which still existed, and he trusted that they would soon be abolished. He might mention woods, mines, and game. There were also new burdens threatened to be put upon owners and occupiers. There were turnpike, education, and election expenses. They would resist these, and all other charges, so long as the burdens fell upon one-seventh of the income of this country. If a man came to a neglected property, and employed his capital in improving it, he was immediately taxed to the extent of 2s. 6d. in the pound. With the tenant was the same. In the case of a labouring man desirous of having a cottage of his own, how was he affected by the rating system? He had probably put away his small savings in the Government savings bank, where it is safely out of the way of rates and taxes; but the very moment he invested his money in a piece of land and built a tenement, down came the overseer and taxed him. In conclusion, the hon. Member thanked the House for the courtesy and attention which they had shown to his rambling, incoherent, and unconnected observations. He believed that the case demanded, and that it would receive, a full and impartial inquiry.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the present amount, incidence, and effect of Local Taxation, with a view to a more equitable re-adjustment of these burdens."—(Sir Massey Lopes.)

MR. GOSCHEN said, that two questions were before the House—first, the reality of the grievance alleged; and, secondly, the remedy proposed for it. The grievance consisted in the incidence of local taxation; the remedy was to refer the subject to a Royal Commission. Now, the hon. Baronet who had so ably raised the question admitted that local and Imperial taxation must be considered together. He spoke of the Imperial taxation as amounting to £70,000,000, and the local taxation to £20,000,000; and his logical mind saw that the two could not be treated separately. What, then, was his proposal? To refer these indivisible questions to "a fair and impartial tribunal"—namely, a Royal Commission. No doubt, a Royal Commission would be fair and impartial; but was the House of Commons prepared to refer the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to a Royal Commission? ["Oh!"] Everyone must admit that, as the hon. Baronet himself showed, it was impossible to separate the two questions, and, therefore, he repeated that in referring local taxation you were practically referring Imperial taxation to this tribunal. How could it be otherwise? The remedy proposed was to make further contributions from Imperial to local funds. It might be perfectly right to do so. He was not at this moment contesting the policy advocated by the two hon. Gentlemen who had spoken. He had not yet said that the grievance complained of was not a real and serious grievance; but he maintained that, if such a grievance existed, there was but one tribunal which could apply a remedy, and that was the House of Commons itself. He did not believe that the majority of the House would be prepared to refer a question of policy of this kind to a Royal Commission. Royal Commissioners were usually appointed to inquire into intricate and complicated questions of fact. Could any precedent be found for referring a matter of this importance to an irresponsible, though fair and impartial, tribunal like the one suggested? He had looked through the list of Royal Commissioners for the last thirty years—they had cost the country, by the way, not less than £1,000,000, but he had not found a single instance in which a question of taxation of such moment as this had been referred to a Royal Commission. He admitted that, as to the grievance itself, every point connected with the local taxation of the country should be made perfectly clear. But it was not difficult to ascertain the facts. Parliament had not got to deal with private bodies, but with public taxes administered by local officers, and with details which it was comparatively easy to obtain. Last Session he himself had alluded to this subject, and had complained of the Returns that were made. He regretted to say that the Returns issued by the Home Office again contained many errors similar to those then pointed out. The Returns were issued early in December, but the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had endeavoured to supplement them by a very carefully drawn Return which was now being made by the officials of the Poor Law Board. When these were produced the House would be able to form a better judgment than they now could form on the subject of local taxation, and the House would then have to decide, not upon details, but upon questions of principle. If it then appeared that the aggregate amount of local taxation upon certain kinds of property was too great considering their contributions for Imperial purposes, it would be the duty of Parliament to deal with that question; and he trusted that in this matter the House would not part with one of the most important functions which it could have to discharge. It was generally held that a private Member could not initiate a subject of Imperial taxation; this was of such importance that the Government were looked upon as responsible. But what a wide departure it would be from that principle if this duty were undertaken not by the House of Commons, but by a Royal Commission! The hon. Gentleman opposite said it was not his duty to propose a remedy; he had simply to ask the Executive Government to do so. Certainly it was the duty of the Executive Government to deal with such a grievance as soon as it was made out, and he did not think the Government would shrink from their responsibility.

He was glad that both the hon. Members who had introduced the subject had been careful to assure the House that this was not a question between town and country, between owner and occupier, landlord and tenant. It was undoubtedly not. The whole country was equally interested in the question, nor could you say of local and Imperial taxation that one was borne by one class and one by another class. The proper plan was to adjust both in the most convenient manner possible, so that the aggregate charge might fall equally upon all. If, however, you found that one kind of property was more available for local and another for Imperial taxation, it was not necessary that each should bear the same proportion of the same charge, provided the difference was allowed for—provided that was, that if the Imperial taxation was a little heavier, the local taxation should be a little lighter, and vice versa. For example, it would not be fair that all property should be exempt from poor rate except real property if it were found that real property contributed the same amount for Imperial purposes. This was the point of view from which the question must be considered; and it was hardly fair to go back to 1776 and see what was borne by the land then. The hon. Baronet pointed out, correctly enough, that the burden borne by the land was at that time exceedingly small; but he did not state what was the Imperial expenditure then, so that the two might be compared; nor did he state what was the amount of rateable property in 1776. Now, he (Mr. Goschen) had not picked out any particular years, but he found in an interesting Paper published in the Appendix to the Report on the Taxation of Ireland that in 1815 the amount of the poor rate, including the county rate, was £8,128,000, while at present it was £10,000,000. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of years when the poor rate was only £4,000,000. Why not go back to 1818, when the poor rate was £8,000,000? It was deplorable that the poor rate should have increased so much of late years; but it had not increased so materially if you took the last half century. Between 1865 and 1868 the total increase, excluding the metropolis, had been 16 per cent. In the metropolis it had been 45 per cent, so it was quite clear that the metropolis had contributed almost one-half to this increase in taxation. It was perfectly fair for the hon. Gentlemen opposite to put the question before the House as they had done. They were better acquainted with the country than with towns, and though they alluded to towns their argument was based upon the position of the country. The hon. Baronet had stated correctly enough that of the rateable property which now contributed to local taxation, £60,000,000 were house property, and £40,000,000 landed property—making £100,000,000. [Sir MASSEY LOPES said, that he had put down the net rental at £93,000,000, the other amount being the gross rental.] Yes, but then the hon. Baronet ought not to take the net rental in estimating what fractional part it formed of the income of the country. He ought to take the gross estimated rental, which was not £93,000,000, but £110,000,000, and the assessment to the income tax of that property was £130,000,000. He only gave those figures, however, to show that the statistical portion of the hon. Baronet's statement might easily be met by a counter statement, by selecting different years and making the estimate on a different principle. He did not mean to deny that there had been a considerable increase in local taxation, and he believed that that increase had fallen far more heavily on the towns than on the county parishes. In 1815, land rated to the support of the poor amounted to £37,000,000, and other property, such as houses, coal mines, and so forth, to £16,000,000, so that, at that time, it might be said that two-thirds of the charges fell upon the land. At present, however, land rated to the support of the poor amounted to £46,000,000, and other species of property to £84,000,000, so that only one-third of the charges now fell upon land. He merely made that statement to justify what had been said by hon. Members opposite and by himself—to show that this was not a question as between town and country. It was needless to go into the many questions which had been gone into by the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) as to the price of land and the capital which was put into the land. So far as this matter was concerned, he thought they had better avoid those illustrations which applied simply to landlords and tenant farmers; because, if they had a grievance, the ratepayers in towns had certainly theirs, and though he might take a somewhat biassed view of it, he thought his constituents in London were as much, if not more, than any class interested in a diminution of local taxation. He earnestly trusted that the subject of local taxation would continue to occupy the attention of the House. It was certainly occupying the attention of Her Majesty's Government, but he thought that, considering that Returns were within a few weeks to be submitted to Parliament on the subject, and that an additional staff was now engaged in the preparation of those Returns; considering, too, that the new Parliament had as yet had no opportunity afforded it of trying its hand at the subject, or even of giving its opinion on it, it would be an almost unprecedented course to refer the matter to a Royal Commission. If, therefore, the Government did not feel it to be compatible with their duty to refer a question of such great moment to a Royal Commission, he trusted that no one in the House, or in the country, would see in that determination the slightest intention to disregard the views which had been put forward, or to ignore the importance of the subject itself. On the contrary, if the Government desired to get rid of a troublesome question, and to put it aside for two or three years, no proposal could be more welcome to them than that of hanging up the subject, as so many others had been hung up, by agreeing to the Motion for its reference to a Royal Commission. To this determination on the part of the Government he thought he might fairly point as a proof of their sincerity in the matter. He was, however, fully impressed with the necessity for carefully ascertaining and collecting the facts before proceeding to deal with the subject, and could assure the House that there was a strong desire in every Department of the Government to co-operate in the work of ascertaining every detail, and to co-operate with the hon. Baronet and every one who took an interest in this subject.

Mr. LIDDELL said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the objections to committing this great and difficult question to the decision of a Royal Commission were well founded, and that it would be better for the House itself to undertake the responsibility of solving the question. He did not however gather from the right hon. Gentleman's speech why it would not be well to submit the question to a Select Committee. His great objection to the system of local taxation, as it was at present carried on, was its utter want of principle. The absence of principle to which he referred was strongly exhibited in the case of Militia buildings. Against the Militia he had nothing to say. He believed them to be, if possible, more valuable to the country than the standing Army, and should like to see rather more spent upon our reserve forces and rather less upon our standing Army; but he could not understand upon what principle of justice any charge connected with this force should be thrown upon the counties. It was perfectly true that these troops were raised in the different counties, but it was the country generally and not the counties to whom these services were valuable; for—save perhaps, once in a century, when called out to suppress a riot—they were embodied solely for purposes of national defence. He could understand why certain localities should be called upon to pay for the repression or discouragement of crime and pauperism in their particular districts. Local taxation should sometimes assume the form of a penalty upon localities for the neglect of social duties, but from this principle we had to a very great extent departed, because from the national Exchequer we provided large sums for the prosecution of criminals and the maintenance of prisoners convicted at the assizes and quarter sessions. The great object which he hoped would be attained by an investigation by a competent Committee would be a careful classification, by which they would be able to learn what objects were to be supported at the national expense, and what at the expense of the various local ratepayers. If there was one thing more purely national than another it was the care of the insane. No amount of pressure or local taxation would prevent the birth of a single lunatic, and the care and maintenance of the insane ought surely to be borne by the nation at large, especially when it was remembered that there was no item of local expenditure which had been more immensely augmented by the action of that House and by the humane requirements of Parliament. Now, his right hon. Friend the Member for Wolver-hampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers) had spoken truly when, as President of the Poor Law Board, he said that the complexity and difficulty connected with the raising of the funds for the support of the poor were not so much to be attributed to the law itself as to the construction which had been put upon it by the Judges. They had decided that all property which was not specified by name in the Act of Elizabeth should, ipso facto, be held to be exempt from local rates, whereas the clear intention of that Act in naming particular descriptions of property was not to exempt others, but to render the assessment of those particular descriptions more certain. That was the opinion held by Mr. Lumley, and no man had studied the subject more closely. He was glad, he might add, to hear his hon. Friend behind him (Sir Massey Lopes) disclaim any intention of rendering stock-in-trade liable to local taxation, but personal property ought, he thought, in all justice to pay its quota to the relief of the poor. But how was personal property to be reached for that purpose, and, when reached, how was it to be allocated? Let him suppose, for instance, that a man living in a villa at Putney had a farm at Uxbridge and £20,000 lodged in the Westminster Bank. It was easy to ascertain what the £20,000 invested at 4 or 5 per cent ought to pay; the great difficulty was to decide how it should be allocated. Would Putney have a right to claim it, or the parish of Westminster, or Uxbridge, or would portions of it be due to each? The subject was one on which the House was not without the advantage of being able to appeal to experience. For 200 years in Scotland, by the old law of the country, the means and substance of a man were liable to pay rates. But as trade and commerce extended in Scotland the difficulty of ascertaining how much each man ought to pay became so great that recourse was had to a sort of arbitrary assessment, under the operation of which the burden of proving whether the amount to which a man was assessed was or was not correct was thrown upon himself. The result was that he had to submit to an inquisitorial search into his circumstances, not by persons sworn to secrecy but by his neighbours, who perhaps happened to have an interest in learning the precise position of his affairs, and the system at last was felt to be so great a grievance that a remedy was sought in the division of property into two or three grades, and rating it on a graduated scale. That occurred in 1845, but, in a Report of the Board of Supervision of the Poor, issued in 1849, only five years afterwards, it was stated that, out of 625 parishes so assessed upon "means and substance," 499 had voluntarily relinquished the system. His object in alluding to this was simply to show the difficulties by which the question was beset, and which it was their duty to face. He did not wish to raise up phantom difficulties, but certainly that example of Scotland, where the laws on rating were better and simpler than in England, was not a very encouraging one. The next point to which he wished to refer was the complexity which enveloped the mode of keeping local accounts. As they were now kept it was almost impossible to unravel them, and it would be the duty of a Committee, he thought, to recommend their being presented in some more simple and intelligible form. There was a very strong feeling existing in the country with respect to the general question before the House, and he was glad to see that the Government were prepared to lend a ready ear to the suggestions made to them. He could not help thinking that a considerable amount of the agitation at present going on was to be attributed to the incidence of the highway rate. The experience they had had of the working of that rate was anything but satisfactory. In his own part of the country no legislation had ever caused more dissatisfaction amongst the ratepayers than the "Highway Acts;" and the Acts under which the rate was imposed would not, he believed, work harmoniously until the charge was made coincident with the area of management. A strong feeling had been expressed by some Members of that House that, in addition to the highways, the maintenance of turnpike roads also ought to be thrown upon the rates. For his part, he thought the system of making those who use the roads pay for their maintenance an admirable one; and, in the existing state of feeling, it would be very unwise to abolish the turnpike trusts, and throw the maintenance of those roads upon the rates. He trusted this discussion would not close without some authoritative decla-

tion that the inquiry asked for was approved by the Government. The House had been told that Returns were forthcoming; but if they proved to be of the complex nature of those already in the possession of hon. Members they would not give satisfaction to the country, which demanded and would rest contented with nothing short of a bond fide searching inquiry into the whole subject, conducted by a competent Committee, with a view to a strict definition of what were fit subjects for local and what for Imperial taxation.

MR. WHALLEY said, the incidence of taxation was a question, not of party, but of political science. He contended that the constitutional principle was to tax the land and fixed property of the country, and that this principle had never been departed from to advantage. The parliaments of the Channel Islands, each of which enjoyed the privilege of self-taxation, had formerly followed the present vicious practice of the English Parliament; but, discovering their error, they now taxed only real property, and left the trade, the brain, and the muscle of their population free from all impost. And this was done although the power of taxing rested exclusively in the hands of owners of real property. The school of political economy whose views he had risen to express had a still stronger argument than the experience of those islands in the fact that all the parishes in England, in their little parliaments, whilst they originally had, according to the hon. Baronet, the power to tax stock-in-trade, had found by their practical experience that it was better to leave the grocer, the baker, and the other traders free. He trusted that the House of Commons would show the same wisdom as that which had been displayed by these local parliaments, in leaving brain, muscle, and commercial capital free to develop themselves for the general benefit of the country. He protested against the observations of the President of the Poor Law Board when he said the question was simply whether the parishes should be relieved of taxation by throwing the charges enumerated by the hon. Baronet upon the Consolidated Fund. Was not the land already compensated by the income tax and sugar, tea, and other similar duties? In 1699 the land tax was settled at a fixed amount. But for that it would have been more than sufficient to defray all the expenditure of the country. There would have been no need of taxation upon tea or sugar, of the income tax of the present day, or of other imposts that diminished the comforts and crippled the industry of the country. He would state a broad proposition and challenge contradiction. There were only two kinds of property that could possibly be subject to taxation, and they were property which was fixed, and which, whatever amount was put upon it, could not run away, and property which consisted of the intellect or muscle of individuals, or the money in a man's pocket; but to attempt to tax the money in a man's pocket, or his muscle or intellect, would be impolitic, because it would interfere with the growth and progress of the nation.

MR. HENNIKER-MAJOR said, that so much had already been said on this subject, not only in the House upon that and former occasions, but outside it, that he should not have ventured to address them did he not as a county Member take a great interest in the matter, nor would he now do more than make a very few remarks. He could not claim the indulgence of the House as a new Member, always given to those who address it for the first time, but he must ask the House to extend to him that indulgence which it had always granted him when he had on previous occasions addressed it. In asking for an inquiry there were two things to be considered—one the grievance sought to be redressed, the other the mode for remedying it. One ground on which inquiry was sought for was that the Act of Elizabeth, of which so much had been heard, intended that the poor rate—and this was the most important rate to consider—should be levied on all according to their ability to pay it, and not exclusively on one kind of property. In all reason this must have been so, for would it not in any other country have been a cause of astonishment that one particular class of property, besides bearing to a great extent the ordinary taxes, should have an extra burden thrown upon it. He never could believe that this was intended, and even if it had been it must be remembered that at that time poor rates were only for strictly parochial purposes; whereas now, independently of other charges upon them, the maintenance of the poor must be considered as of national importance. Whatever the law might be, the bare fact of these charges being placed upon one-third of the income of the country was sufficient to call for immediate attention. The right hon. Gentleman the late Premier had made a most remarkable speech in 1849 on this subject—remarkable for this reason, that, although delivered twenty years ago, if any one wished to see the present reasons for an inquiry well and powerfully put, he could not do better than read that speech. The right hon. Gentleman then said that the matter called for immediate re-adjustment, for £10,000,000 annually was being levied by local taxation; how much more, therefore, now was it necessary when, as far as could be ascertained, £20,000,000 was levied annually? He had no doubt, however, that it would be admitted on all sides that there were just grounds to go upon for revision; he would, therefore, say no more on that head. As to the remedy, some might say there was no cause for inquiry—that the Government of themselves could bring in a scheme without it. In fact, schemes had been proposed by various people, some of them very good ones; but he could not but think that the subject was such a complex one that no plan could be brought forward with a fair chance of settling the question without a full inquiry in the first instance. When the present state of the law was considered, when it was considered that some provisions could not be, others were not carried out; when the difficulty of reviewing in the House the whole state of the law and re-considering its bearing on the various interests concerned, now and for the future, was taken into account, as well as the delay that would be occasioned, and, above all, the fact that the question was one of very great magnitude and scope, far larger even than any question of Imperial taxation, he could not but think that inquiry was necessary. The rating of metallic mines was a question in itself whether the Act of Elizabeth ever intended them to be exempted; and, if so, whether it was fair, as at present, that a burden should be placed on the ratepayers of a district where a mine was situated to support a population which were perhaps brought into the neighbourhood to work the mine, and to the maintenance of whom, when they became paupers, the mine itself did not contribute. No doubt important steps had been and would be taken to remedy this. Whatever was done, he hoped that local management would be maintained, even if the ratepayers were not relieved to so great an extent as they otherwise might be. One word more and he had done. He hoped a Commission would be appointed, as he believed that an inquiry of that kind would be the most satisfactory to the various interests involved. He agreed with the hon. Baronet who had brought this Motion before the House in the reasons he gave for a Commission, particularly in regard to one point, that it would be entirely divested of all party feeling and party politics; and an additional reason he would give, that the inquiry was likely to be a long one; if a Parliamentary Committee were to be appointed they could not sit after the end of the Session, but a Commission could. This would save time. He might, perhaps, appear to speak from one point of view only; but he could, however, assure the House that he looked upon the question as of equal importance to the towns as to the country districts. He regretted that they had not before them more accurate figures to go upon; and it might be said that they ought to have waited for the Return moved for last Session before entering into this discussion; but no doubt the figures they had were sufficiently accurate, and he felt that there ought to be no delay in making the inquiry. It must be a long one, and before any new burdens were imposed surely the matter ought to be settled—for instance, the maintenance of turnpike roads. If the maintenance of turnpike roads were placed on parishes that charge ought to be considered as being similar to many other charges which had been thrown from time to time on the local rates. Turnpike roads were once the main arteries of communication in this country; now they were not so. Yet the parishes had already to bear—for the public good, not for their own—the burden of keeping up roads which led to those main centres of traffic, now the railway stations. Ought they to continue to maintain those roads and also to have an extra burden cast upon them without full and fair inquiry? With respect to Financial Boards, they might not perhaps strictly form a part of the present question; but if those

Mr. Henniker-Major

Boards were to be established—and he approved the principle—he thought the whole matter ought to be carefully looked into before any portion of it was placed under a new system of management. He regretted that the Government would not at the present time consent to an inquiry; but he trusted they would eventually, for he felt that the matter could not be settled without it, and that it was the only way to a speedy and at the same time a satisfactory solution of the question. The hon. Member concluded by apologizing for detaining the House, and thanking it for its kind indulgence.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, that after the able and lucid speech of the President of the Poor Law Board and the assurance which that Minister had given that that subject engaged the anxious attention of the Government, he should have thought it unnecessary to prolong the debate, but as hon. Members had continued the discussion he desired to make a few remarks. The House and the country, in his opinion, were much indebted to the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) for bringing forward that question, which was certainly one much requiring careful consideration. But it was more one for a Committee of that House than for a Commission. It might have been very properly considered by a Committee, such as had been asked for by his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton a few years ago, and which he regretted was not then granted. If the matter were duly considered and weighed the result might perhaps be very different from that anticipated by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon. All persons who were interested in land ought to consider whether what were usually termed “burdens” were burdens in reality. Take the maintenance of the roads, for example. Did not the landlords receive an equivalent for that expense in the increase of rent which was the result of good roads being kept up? About the time when the first approximation to Free Trade was made in this country, he happened to be at Odessa, and he inquired of an intelligent man whom he met what would be its probable effect on the price of corn and the value of property in South Russia? The reply was, “If we had as good roads as you have in England we should flood you with our corn.” If the Russians had as good roads, at as moderate a cost as we had, their competition would be much more formidable. Then as to the so-called burden of poor rates. He thought it had been clearly shown by persons of great experience that the owners of land received a full equivalent for those rates, as it was more economical to maintain the poor by a well-regulated system than to encourage that kind of unrestrained mendicancy which had prevailed, to a certain extent, in Ireland, before there was a regular Poor Law. Indeed, he had heard a person well acquainted with the country assert that in former times more landlords were ruined by the want of a Poor Law than by the extravagance of which they were so commonly accused. The poor rate was, in point of fact, a very cheap equivalent for the irregular demands made by the poor upon the resident landlords in countries where the Poor Law system was not established. Hon. Gentlemen who complained of the amount of local taxation ought to state plainly what remedy they proposed for the existing state of things. Where was the equivalent to come from? Was it to be derived from a tax on the stock-in-trade in the country, or from Imperial taxes? The former expedient, he believed, would not be seriously urged, and if the charge was to be placed on Imperial taxes it was not easy to suggest which of those taxes ought to be selected. If it were placed on income, the income tax would be greater than the country would feel inclined to bear; and it would be impossible for the Government to continue the removal of the restrictions on commerce and consumption, which had so much increased the value of property. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Read) had suggested the removal of the duties on fire insurances of all descriptions. How could the Chancellor of the Exchequer effect this if fresh charges were laid on the Consolidated Fund? The hon. Member for South Devon had talked much about the pressure of rates on the poor occupier struggling to keep himself independent, but if the taxes on tea, coffee, sugar, &c., were increased, the poor occupier, to whom those articles were almost necessities of life, would be worse off than he was at present. On the other hand, would not the condition of those people be improved much more by getting rid of the taxes on the articles

he had named. Suppose, too, that with a view to benefit the poor cottager, they were to consider the question of licenses, which prevented him reaping the full benefit of the reductions already made in these articles. But this could not be done if we put any large portion of the rates on Imperial taxation. The whole question of local taxation, however, could not be properly considered apart from the question of Imperial taxation, and he hoped that both those important subjects would shortly receive the consideration, not of a Commission, but of the Government and the House.

MR. DE GREY said, he would assume the principle that it could not be right or just that two-thirds of the property of this country should escape the taxation which was borne by the other third, unless the object of that taxation were one more especially benefiting that particular portion which bore it. On this point he believed he should meet with a very general assent from the House, though, on account of a great portion of that property which escaped local taxation not being of a local or visible nature, it might be somewhat difficult in that case to carry out the principle to its legitimate conclusion; but the justice of the principle had been so far conceded that Parliament had consented to subsidize in a degree those payments which for a long period had been a burden upon local and visible property; as, for instance, in the matter of the administration of criminal justice. To a certain extent this principle of subsidizing had, he believed, been also acted upon with reference to the maintenance of the poor. This, the heaviest burden borne by that portion of the property of the country upon which it had fallen, and which, under the name of poor rate, had pressed so heavily upon it, was certainly not originally intended to be exclusively so borne; but the unfortunate use of the words by which it was intended to include other kinds of property—he meant the expression “stock-in-trade”—in the Act of Elizabeth was the occasion of so many difficulties that annual Acts of Parliament were for several years passed to exempt that which was intended to be included under the term, and ultimately a general Act was passed exempting that species of property and throwing the entire burden upon that which was included under the name of real or landed property. The great change which had occurred in the relative proportions of income derived from real and personal property, and the great addition which had been made to the amount of local charges in consequence of increase of population and the greater requirements of improved civilization, had rendered this burden, falling as it did upon one-third only of the general property of the country, a real and very serious grievance, sensibly interfering with the well-being of the owners and occupiers of land. Though the income derived from land had no doubt increased, it had not kept pace with the much greater increase of the income derived from many other sources which might be generally included under the term “personal property.” Nor was the difficulty of ascertaining, at least approximately, the amount of income derived from these sources so great as it might at first sight appear. For national purposes it was ascertained and charged under the name of income tax, and if it were admitted that the maintenance of the poor and other purposes for which at present local rates were collected were, properly speaking, national objects, it was not too much to affirm, that on a broad principle of justice, everything which was taxed to supply the Consolidated Fund should be taxed for those purposes also. But immediately a difficulty arose. Could they localize taxation derived from sources other than local and visible? In his opinion this was not impossible, but he did not feel competent at present, nor, indeed, was it necessary, to enter into the details of any measure for that purpose, because the proposition before the House was simply for a Commission of Inquiry. He feared that many of those who contemplated bringing all property under contribution for purposes hitherto supplied by means of local rates, contemplated something in the nature of a national rate. Now, above all things, he should deprecate any attempt of such a nature. He believed that if the poor were to be maintained, our gaols supported, and our highways kept in order, by local authorities drawing upon a national fund, there would be a general scramble from all parts of the country, each district endeavouring to obtain for itself the largest possible amount out of that fund. But considering that all taxes for national purposes were locally collected, would it not be possible to levy rates in proportion to and upon the same basis as that on which national taxation was now collected in the localities in which it arose for the local purposes of the district? If, however, this were not possible, and he admitted there would be great difficulty in carrying out the details, might not a plan be devised by which an average should be taken of the expenditure of each district or union during a certain number of years, that that average should become a charge upon the Consolidated Fund, and that if that average were exceeded the difference should be raised by rates in the same manner as they were now levied? This would retain the local interest in keeping down the expenditure and preventing its rising above the average. But it would still be necessary to consider the case of the expenditure falling below the average. There would, he thought, be no difficulty in applying any surplus that might arise to local objects of a public nature under the direction of the Poor Law or other Government Boards. In few cases probably would that surplus be large, but should it be so, might not a fund be obtained in that way for assisting in the purposes of education? He had made these few remarks with a view to offering a suggestion in case of any Commission being appointed in consequence of the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes). He desired to see justice meted out equally to all classes in the country. Broad principles should be established without reference to the interests of individuals even in the matter of taxation; but, above all, he would caution the House that, while they perceived the injustice of our present system, they should avoid any measure which would promote that extravagance and demoralization which he believed would be the consequence of the adoption of the principle of a national rate. Under these circumstances, feeling as he did that the various and important interests involved in this question would be best dealt with by Royal Commission, he should support the Motion of the hon. Baronet.

MR. CORRANCE said*: I need scarcely say that I most cordially endorse the requirements of my hon. Friend for a Commission upon this most important subject, which has only been postponed too long; and I must rejoice that he has followed up his Resolution of last year by a Motion which promises some practical result. At an earlier period I made a similar Motion, but it was withdrawn at the instances made to me in this House. Perhaps it was only just, for there is no doubt that it comes before a ratepayers' Parliament with unusual force. This, indeed, was foreseen, and the character of the question is very different from that which it has hitherto presented. It must be felt that it is so by hon. Members on that Bench, for there is not one of them who will not at some future, I trust distant date, be held responsible for the decision they come to to-night. There is one thing I regret. I regret that any disinclination to grant this Commission should have been shown on the part of Government, and from the reasons assigned by the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Poor Law Board, I entirely dissent. What were these reasons? First, he tells us that it cannot even be considered apart from the greater question of Imperial taxation. There is something at least novel about this. Not considered! Why it has been a matter of separate consideration for a half century or thereabouts. Why, it formed the subject for a Parliamentary Inquiry in 1825, of a Poor Law Commission in 1843; and of a Committee in 1850. And if this great necessity exists, why has it not formed part of the great revision of Imperial taxation which has already taken place? Next, the right hon. Gentleman tells us our case is not complete, we must wait for some further Returns about to be made to this House. These Returns will be as available for a Commission as they would be for this House. We do not pretend to legislate, nor is it a Bill we introduce. Well, but our grievance is not made out. We do not come here as grievance-mongers, nor do we put this forward as a special source of complaint to a class; but the right hon. Gentleman has himself, only as lately as last evening, shown that both anomalies and hardships do exist. Surely so far as this is a matter capable of remedy, that grievance does exist. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that even the existing burdens fall short of those of a prior time, and for this he takes an early date. Why does he do this? Because at that date the iniquities of the Poor Law were at their height. Rates at 20s. in the pound. Are we to be satisfied at anything less than this? I must contend that no point of comparison exists. Further, he takes exception to the remedies proposed upon this side of the House. Well, I do not myself agree to most. But the right hon. Gentleman, no later than last year, proposed a remedy himself—an income tax—no less—[Mr. GOSCHEN: I beg your pardon.]—Then the right hon. Gentleman has been wrongly reported, and my own ears deceived me upon this point. He said, “Only give me 1*d.* of income tax assessed as a rate in aid, and we can deal with the matter as we ought.” Well, we have not gone beyond that. I take the right hon. Gentleman’s testimony as against himself. But we do not only rest upon that for there is other concurrent testimony upon this point—that if we seek relief through a rate in aid it is no new theory we advance. In a Committee in 1859 upon Poor Law Irremovability we find Mr. Sotheron Estcourt speaking thus—

“I do not know whether it is necessary to say more than that I think that both with regard to unions and parishes it would be a fair thing to facilitate the means of obtaining a rate in aid, and so taking one more step towards equalizing the burden all over the country. But I think by the old form of a rate in aid I shall at least stave off during our time that which I think would be perfect ruin to the country—namely, an attempt to raise the money for the relief of the poor by anything like a general rate either of the nation or even of any county; and I think so because nothing is so ruinous as the idea of entrusting expenditure to those who are not the representatives of the persons from whom the money is to be raised. It has also this merit—it is 250 years old.”

This is no unimportant point, and would lend sanction to projects less doubtful than those we have advanced. Even recently we also have the authority of Mr. C. P. Villiers as to the necessity we allege to exist. He speaks thus—

“In my opinion nothing can be more unfair and conspicuous than the charge of the poor rate. I do not express that opinion for the first time. I was acting on the original Commission for the Poor Law, and I was struck by seeing the extraordinary unfairness with which this charge fell on different persons and places, and the vast number who were totally exempt from such a charge.”

Now these ought at least to be received as complete and sufficient proof of the necessity now existing of an inquiry upon these points, resting upon what I may venture to call intellectual recognition of matter requiring redress. It is not wanting in practical proof. Does it constitute a special charge upon any industry or class, and of this what are the effects? Now, I think I may say that it has been proved that it does form a most serious charge upon land, not that I shall restrict my area of consideration to it, for it falls upon houses and railroads, and several other properties to a similar effect. But if, I say, it does fall upon such an industry in at all greater proportion than any other what will be the effect. Let me give an instance of this. In 1795, and at the beginning of the present century, stock-in-trade was pretty generally rated in the North. It gained ground just as the stock of woolstapler and clothier increased. Now, mark the recorded effect; when the practice of rating stock-in-trade was fully established in this district, the ancient staple trade rapidly declined, and withdrew itself still more rapidly into the more northern parts, where no such burden was cast upon the trade. Now, this may seem to some to be a cogent argument in favour of the exemption from what I may term the protective side of the question, but I must carry you a little beyond this. Capital naturally shifted itself to the protected trade, no doubt, but before we give ourselves up to any transports upon this there is one suggestion that I would venture to make—namely, that we have no right to make such a protected interest; and, secondly, that you have made such a protected interest in this case. What we say is this, the effect of your exemption has, as between the two industries affected, produced a precisely similar effect to that which I now quote between the two branches of the same trade—it has created a protected interest, and from this our taxed capital has fled. In these days it is time that this should cease. And now, as to the argument that landlords will get it all. I have heard the argument before. I think once—namely, when the right hon. Gentleman who now sits upon that Treasury Bench was belabouring these Benches, with well meant, if not sound advice, to give up Protection, and to permit cheap bread—the somewhat ungracious rejoinder was this—the artizan will not get it. You the masters will spin cheaper, with lower wages, and so you did; but your trade increased and the wages went up, and the men have realized the larger profit perhaps. So I do not think it probable that the landlords will get it all, and I am even inclined to hope that some may reach the labouring man. Perhaps, indeed, it may be thought, that of all matters for our consideration, this one presses most, and certainly there is no one that is capable of such easy proof as the pressure of these taxes upon the poorer class. Its action is two-fold in such respects, direct and indirect. To income tax we have at least been careful that men of small means shall not be called upon to contribute, and it has likewise been held good policy that upon articles of the first necessity the taxes should be light. How do we stand here in this respect? You, especially, who desire subdivision of land will do well to mark this. The miserable hovel at a £2 rent pays this tax. The allotment of the labouring man pays this tax. The cottage garden and cottage pays this tax. The few acres of the lesser tenants, as well as the lordly farmer, pays this tax, and for what and to what amount? He pays for his fellow-paupers wants—for the road he walks on—the bridge he does not go over—the police to watch over his property. In the towns is it better? Go to the east end of this city and put it to the vote. I may refer to the right hon. Gentleman opposite for this. And in what proportion does it take effect to income tax? We think sorely of the extra pennies, out of 6*d.* in the pound, where we many of us pay 4*s.* 6*d.* and 5*s.* Now, I take the description given in The Times of taxpayers of this class—

“The property tax is raised from an income of £300,000,000. The rates of England from real property alone, form one-third that amount. Upon the one we raise £6,000,000, and upon the other £12,000,000.”

There are, therefore, three distinct grades of taxation in this country—those who pay indirect—a more favoured class, who pay the direct; and another class, higher in the fiscal hierarchy, who are privileged to pay rates. Now, what sort of an aristocracy is this fiscally favoured class? It would take a finer pencil than mine to delineate—the bloated ratepayers—the citizen privileged to pay rates. And, once more, what are its indirect effects. Just now there are not wanting some very earnest friends of the agricultural labourer, and I call their attention to this—the state of every wage-paid class must depend upon the economical condition of the industry itself. If that industry is prosperous capital will flow in, and the wages of labour be increased; if not the fund will decrease and the labour be less. Now, we have before seen the effect of special taxation upon this, in the instance of the wool trade. Now, with regard to agriculture you have done this, and heavily weighted the lags in the race. Capital does not come in, and labour is of the lowest class. Ask any authority and he will tell you that this need not be the case. Agriculture could absorb double the capital, but no industry could survive such a special impost as this; 4*s.* in the pound shuts the doors in the capitalist's face. Now, to some of my enthusiastic friends who really wish to raise the labourers' condition I recommend this; as an economical question it is really worth their while to study its effects. You cannot raise wages by Acts of Parliament except of this class; but you can put each industry upon an equal footing by making your taxation just. Have we no claim to this? Well, but we are not the only petitioners in this case. When last year I had the honour of seconding the Motion of my hon. Friend, I called especial attention to this; and the great interest of owners and occupiers of house property, as well as railway proprietors, and other taxed interests to this. Of such burdens they bear the larger half. It is true that by the late hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), whose absence in this House most must regret, a distinction was attempted to be drawn, by calling this a house tax of a special class. I do not think that he was very successful in showing in what the distinction consisted. At all events if there is any real, and not merely politic distinction to be drawn, no doubt by a Commission it will be winnowed out. But, if all other reasons were insufficient, one consideration should suffice, we cannot remain in our present position if we would, and each instant of delay imposes fresh difficulties in our path. Last Session ought to have sufficiently proved this. For years past burden after burden has been imposed upon these rates, and by this means every new administrative crotchet is to be carried out. Well, there is a limit to this, and the ratepayer, though a man of infinite patience, has discovered that his is not after all the national purse. We have come to the Imperial Exchequer and have met with an invariable rebuff. Re-

proposal of the hon. Member for South Devonshire for inquiry by Commission, because he knew that the hon. Member had acted in an independent spirit, and because he thought he had only spoken the truth when he said that he sought to drag this great question from the fangs of party. It was unfortunate that even after all these years there should be a prejudice against them because they had once been Protectionists. He was one still. ["Oh!"] He repeated what he had published, and what was in the Library of the House of Commons, in the introduction to the work called The Tariffs of all Nations—namely, that they would be compelled to re-consider the system of free imports. But whether they had or had not to re-consider their decision upon that point, it would at all events conduce to defer the time for re-considering that question if they were to adopt the means now pointed out for equalizing the taxation of the country. Let not those who sat on the opposite side of the House show themselves so jealous that they dare not entrust a Commission composed of those who were not party men with the power of inquiring into one branch only of our taxation. He asked for information—information to be collected by those who were free from party bias—and a refusal to grant it would bear the interpretation throughout the country that the Government had come to the determination that no information should be furnished to the House but what was tinged by party feeling. Such had been the ability with which the hon. Member for South Devonshire had stated the case of the ratepayers of the country—not merely that of the agricultural occupiers, but that also of the occupiers of small tenements in large towns such as those of Birmingham—that he had felt it to be his duty to tender his humble support to his proposal that Her Majesty should be humbly requested to issue a Commission composed of men unbiassed by party feeling, who should inquire into the whole subject of our local taxation.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, when my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Goschen) delivered, what I thought to be his very clear and able speech, he appeared to me to place the House in possession of the views entertained by himself and by the Government, and I confess I did not think it would be requisite for any one to rise from this Bench during the remainder of this discussion—a discussion, I may add, which I understand has been carried on under the belief that the hon. Member for South Devonshire (Sir Massey Lopes) having heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was not disposed to press further. The speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down, however, shows that upon certain points he, at all events, has not fully comprehended my right hon. Friend. It is of importance that the position, the intention, and the language of my right hon. Friend should not be misunderstood; and it is but just to the hon. Member for South Devonshire that no misapprehension upon the subject he has brought forward should be allowed to exist. The hon. Member who has just resumed his seat thinks that the right hon. Gentleman objected to the appointment of a Commission on the ground that it involved a delegation and an alienation in the matter of taxation of the legislative functions of this House. But the right hon. Gentleman, in reality, took no such objection. Both the argument and the illustration of the right hon. Gentleman ought to have prevented any such misapprehension arising. What he pointed out was that by acceding to the proposal of the hon. Member for South Devonshire we should be parting with the initiative of this House in matters of taxation—a matter on which this House is so jealous that it will not permit an independent Member of its own body to propose either the expenditure of public money or the taxes from which that money is derived. The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that, as in the view of all men, and as in the view of the hon. Mover of the Motion himself, the two questions of Imperial and local taxation were too inextricably mixed up together, and that to devolve upon a Commission under such circumstances the examination of the advisability of a general re-adjustment of local taxation was, in point of fact, to place in the hands of that Commission the question of Imperial taxation, and to give the Commission that initiative which the House would not permit its own private Members to exercise. The hon. Member who has just sat down says that the Poor Law Commission, which was appointed in 1831, affords an exact precedent for the Motion now made, but that is not the case. The Motion now made is a Motion for a reference to a Commission of the incidents and the effects of local taxation and for the more equitable re-adjustment of its burdens. The hon. Member has not read to us the terms of the Poor Law Commission, but, speaking from recollection, I deny that the purpose of that Poor Law Commission was to examine into the question of taxation. It was appointed to examine into the administration of the law and into its social effects upon the poor, and from my recollection of its terms I may say that all reference to taxation in the Report of that Commission were of a secondary and collateral character, and were intended to illustrate, by referring to its effects upon property, the main subject and gist of the Report—namely, the administration of the Poor Laws and their effects upon the poor. If that be so, it is quite idle to say that the appointment of that Commission forms in the slightest degree a precedent for appointing a Commission to examine into local taxation, with the avowed intention of re-adjusting by its means the present system of our local taxation, and probably doing so by means of a charge in some shape or another upon the Imperial Exchequer. The hon. Member seemed to think that the purpose of my right hon. Friend was to anticipate or retard, or in some manner or other to discourage, the obtaining of information. What I understand to be the position of the Government is this:—My right hon. Friend has pointed out that the Motion of the hon. Member is one which comes recommended by every motive that can address itself to the indolence, the indifference, and the timidity of an Administration. Because if we were to accede to that Motion, and to advise the appointment of a Royal Commission for the purpose recommended by the hon. Gentleman, I think all who hear me, and who bear in mind the complexity and the extent of the subject, will agree with me when I state that it would give us a lease of several years of peace and tranquillity in reference to the discussion of this matter. Instead of taking such a course, what says my right hon. Friend? He draws a distinction, and I think a just distinction, between a Commission to recommend a policy and a Commission to make inquiry. With reference to a Commission to recommend a policy, he has pointed out that it is hardly consistent with the character or usages of Parliament, or with the public interest, that such a matter should be transferred to the hands of any Commission, however wisely and justly chosen. With respect to a Commission for information merely, my right hon. Friend has stated that he thinks the exertions which have been made under the late Government, and which he is now continuing, will enable him without any loss of time to bring before the House all the information which it will require in order to form its judgment on the subject. And my right hon. Friend has admitted, what I can have no hesitation in repeating, that we are entirely conscious that this question stands in the very forward position in respect of its claim on the attention of the Government. Having in view, even within the next few days, a measure which, taken in conjunction with other measures already announced, must occupy, in all probability, the whole available time of Parliament during the Session, I do not think it would be wise or prudent in us, or candid towards the House, if we attempted to define the precise period at which it would be possible for us to propose legislation on the subject of local taxation. But this I will say,—that if this great Constitutional question were once fairly disposed of or put out of the way by legislation, I do think it would then be the duty of the Government to make such proposals as they might think were called for, though to discuss the nature of these proposals now would be wholly premature, with regard to a matter standing in the very first ranks of duties devolving upon the Government. With that declaration we might fairly have called upon the hon. Member for South Devon, but that he has, in fact, anticipated the call, to abstain from pressing his Motion for the issue of a Royal Commission. There is only one other topic which it is necessary for me to mention, and that is the suggestion made by one or two hon. Members that a Committee of the House of Commons might take in hand this subject. Well, undoubtedly there is not precisely the same form of objection to the action of a Committee which might justly be applied to the intervention of a Royal Commission. But I own it appears to me that, although a Committee of this House is a very useful instrument, it is an instrument of limited power. I can conceive that with respect to portions of this question the appointment of a Committee might be prudent and useful. I do not pretend now to indicate in any more precise terms what might be capable of being done in this direction, but so much I will say in general terms. But I am convinced that the whole scope of this question is beyond the powers of any Committee which could be appointed for the purpose. And though I am not in the least degree desirous to prevent the discussion of that subject if it should be thought proper to raise it, and wishing to pay respect to a suggestion, even incidentally made by hon. Members, I must say that we should be in a manner shrinking from the grave responsibilities of an Executive Government were we to propose to the House a general devolution of this question on a Committee of the House of Commons; for the powers of such a Committee, I am convinced, would not be adequate to its settlement, and it would hardly be possible for any Committee to devote to it such an amount of time as would lead to a satisfactory conclusion. I hope it will be understood from the remarks I have made that the Government are by no means insensible of the importance—I would even say, after the explanation I have given—of the urgency of this question; and if they decline to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member, it is not because they are indisposed to the performance of their own duty, but because they do not wish to shift that duty upon another and less responsible agency.

MR. HUNT congratulated his hon. Friend (Sir Massey Lopes) on the very important declaration which had been made by the First Minister of the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman had acknowledged that the subject brought forward and discussed that evening was one of the most forward subjects for consideration, and had promised that at the earliest moment compatible with the other engagements of the Government he and his Colleagues would devote their earnest attention to the matter. Though the particular mode of pursuing this question proposed by his hon. Friend had not been assented to by the Government, he had substantially attained his object. The Government refused to grant a Royal Commission, but they said, "We ourselves will be your Royal Commission."

They undertook to ascertain all the facts necessary for enabling the public to form a judgment upon the question; and, further, to bring forward, at the earliest possible moment, such measures as would constitute a proper solution of the question. In giving this undertaking, the right hon. Gentleman had acted wisely, for the subject was one which the population of the country had deeply thought over. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Goschen), following the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), had well remarked that this was not a question of one class or of another, not a question of town or country. Wherever he (Mr. Hunt) went, when the fiscal burdens of the people were discussed, it was not Imperial, but local taxation which was complained of. Whether in the agricultural districts, with which he was most familiar, or among the thickly-crowded population represented by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, the feeling was the same. His own attention had been called particularly to the great difficulty which the Metropolitan Board of Works had in obtaining funds to carry on the contemplated improvements. The metropolitan ratepayers were so heavily burdened that they almost gave way under the weight of the last straw. Under these circumstances, it was no wonder that the burden of local taxation continually occupied the thoughts of the people of this country. He had felt it his duty to investigate the matter last Session, and with that object endeavoured to find out what materials were available for information. He had been astonished to find how very meagre the data were: there really existed no reliable figures, and nobody had it in his power to give a synopsis of the local rates bearing upon the people of this country in the different parts of the Empire. With a view to obtain the information that was so desirable, he moved at the close of last Session for some comprehensive Returns, upon the preparation of which, not only the officers of the Department, but an extra staff were engaged, and he had been happy to learn from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the information would be available at any early date. He looked forward to the presentation of those Returns with great interest, and he believed they would afford a mass of information such as heretofore had never been possessed. He hoped his hon. Friend, having elicited such an important declaration from the First Minister of the Crown, would rest satisfied with the result which had been attained; and the House generally, he felt sure, would accord to his hon. Friend their gratitude for the very able manner in which he had brought forward the subject.

SIR MASSEY LOPES expressed his satisfaction at the assurance given by the Government, and consented to withdraw his Motion on the understanding that if they did not take some effectual steps he should herewith renew his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. MONK, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to remove restrictions from certain Officers employed in the collection and management of Her Majesty's Revenues, and to enable them to take part unreservedly in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, said, that the Act passed in the last Session enabled the Revenue Officers to vote at Parliamentary Elections; it also relieved Officers in the Excise department from an exceptionally heavy fine of £500, and from other penalties, to which they were liable, if they interfered in elections, but some enactments of the reigns of William and Mary and Anne still remained unrepealed, under which Officers in the Customs and Post Office became liable to a penalty of £100, and were rendered incapable of holding any office of trust under the Crown, if they took part in elections by persuading persons to vote, or to abstain from voting, for particular candidates. A similar Act affecting the Inland Revenue Officers, 5 & 6 Will. & Mary, c. 20, s. 48, had been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act of 1867. It was his intention to have moved the insertion of the sections relating to the Post Office and Customs in his Bill of last year; but in the face of the threatened opposition of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would have perilled the safety of his measure if he had then endeavoured to repeal those sections. He trusted that no opposition would now be made to a proposal to enable officers in the Post Office and the Customs to exercise the same rights as their brethren engaged in other branches of the Civil Service in regard to freedom of speech, the liberty to canvass at elections, and to propose or second candidates if they thought proper, instead of being allowed as at present merely to record their votes.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had no intention to oppose the introduction of the Bill, because it would be desirable to see the measure and examine its precise effect upon the law. He should reserve his freedom of judgment until he had satisfied himself as to the exact purport of the inequalities in the existing rights of different Departments of the public service, because, unless caution were exercised, they would end by creating new inequalities. It was quite clear that this was a matter which would have to be considered with reference to other persons besides those who were employed in what was called the Civil Service of the State. He was quite sure that his hon. Friend did not wish the Government to act with undue haste in this matter. He would consider the measure with every desire of agreeing with his hon. Friend, but at the same time of arriving at such a conclusion as might be expedient.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to remove restrictions from certain Officers employed in the collection and management of Her Majesty's Revenues, and to enable them to take part unreservedly in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONK, Sir HARRY VERNY, and Mr. CRAUFORD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 14.]

UNIVERSITY TESTS BILL.

(In the Committee.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, in rising to move "That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal certain Tests and alter certain Statutes affecting the constitution of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge," said, he did not propose to offer any observations upon the subject, which had been repeatedly before the House. As it had been so often discussed, it would be mere waste of time at present to enter into a lengthened explanation of the subject.

He would simply state that the Bill which he intended to introduce was a reprint of the Bill of last year.

MR. MOWBRAY said, leave was given for the introduction of the Bill in the last Parliament without opposition, and he did not of course intend to make any objection to the present Motion. He rose only for the purpose of saying that in its future stages it would meet with the same opposition as in the last Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal certain Tests and alter certain Statutes affecting the constitution of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Mr. BOUVIER, and Mr. GRANT DUFF.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 15.]

MONEY LAWS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. DELAHUNTY, in rising to move a Resolution, for leave to bring in a Bill to equalize the Money Laws of England and Ireland, by extending to Ireland the provisions of the Act seventh George the Fourth, chapter six, "To prohibit the issuing of Promissory Notes under a limited sum," said, that no doubt Ireland had natural capabilities equal to those of any other country on the face of the globe. There was no doubt that her position, surrounded as she was by water, gave her the finest facilities for commerce with all parts of the world. The reason why she had not progressed so much as England was because she had not been treated as an integral portion of the Empire. He did not wish to attribute blame to any one; he durst say that as much blame was attributable to Irish Members as to anybody; but there must be "something rotten in the state of Denmark" when Irishmen had to go to other countries to seek the employment they could not secure at home. What was called the Irish difficulty was, in his opinion, mainly attributable to exceptional and differential legislation, and if they wanted Ireland to be prosperous and contented they must extend the same laws to that country as to England. He particularly referred to the Money Laws, which pressed more severely against Ireland than any exceptional laws under which she suffered. If Parliament was not prepared to have equal laws for Ireland and England in every matter, it might commence with equalizing the Money Laws, by extending to Ireland the Act which passed for England in 1826, putting an end to the small Note circulation and thereby giving that country the advantage of a free specie circulation, backed up by a large Note currency. When, previous to the Bank Restoration Act of 1797, Ireland, like England, had no small Note circulation, she had an abundant gold circulation as well as large Note paper, and, although trading restrictions were then enforced by England against Ireland, the latter country progressed so that her imports and exports were in comparison to those of Great Britain in the proportion of one to four. In 1777, the Irish were £6,238,366, the British £26,134,839; in 1789, the Irish £7,935,605, the British £37,835,500; in 1792, the Irish £9,725,772, the British £44,033,785; and even after 1797, when Bank paper was inconvertible and small Notes allowed to circulate, Ireland held her own; and her population which, according to the Census of 1801, was in proportion to that of England as 11 to 20, increased in like proportion, as long as equal Money Laws prevailed, but immediately after 1829, under the Act of 1826, small Notes ceased to exist in England, the proportion of increase fell to 5 to 20; and the Irish Bank Act of 1845, which prohibited the formation of new Banks of Issue, and limited and restricted the existing Banks in their issue of Notes, was so fatal in its operation in restricting the circulation, that the population of the country which, according to its increase up to 1829, should, in 1861, be 11,500,000, was only 5,750,000, leaving Ireland deficient some 6,000,000 of people which she ought and would have had, if industrial manufactures were not destroyed by bad Money Laws. He had long ago come to the conclusion that the want of the Money Law of 1826 had done more to injure Ireland than the want of any other legislation. The operation of the Act of 1845, limiting the formation of Banks of Issue and restricting the issue of Notes, had been a blow to Ireland from which she would never recover unless Parliament also extended to that country the Law of 1826. In 1826, when England was commercially and financially prostrate, from the fatal effects of a small Note currency, there were many distinguished men in the Government, including Mr. Huskisson, Mr. Canning, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Liverpool, and Mr. Goulburn. They desired to introduce good legislation, and they brought in a Bill in February to put an end to small Notes—the same month that he was proposing to bring in his Bill—and they had it passed in March. This was an example for them. The result of the Act was to lay the foundation of England's commercial prosperity; but unfortunately the same laws were not applied to Ireland, and the want of those laws, to his mind, brought death to Ireland; and they were left to the present day without a population adequate to that of England, as they had possessed before. If the Union had been based on any fair and proper principles it would have been a blessing to both England and Ireland; but it was based on the assumption of different interests. Restrictions were placed on the trade of both countries. Protective laws were enacted to prevent Irish manufactures being introduced in England, and similar laws in Ireland discouraged the introduction of English manufactures, when there ought to have been free trade between the two countries. Inconvertible Notes were the order of the day till 1819. The effect of the resumption of cash payments in England and Ireland was to pull down the prices both of manufacturing and agricultural produce to an extent which created the greatest dissatisfaction in the country; but the Government were firm. They did not repeal the Act of 1819. They would not return to an inconvertible paper currency; without gold they could not have paper. Without the basis on which convertibility depended, paper itself could not exist. He was old enough to remember the existence of thriving cotton, woollen, silk, glass, and iron manufactures in Ireland, and if they would only extend the Money Laws of England to Ireland her industrial resources would speedily be advantageously developed. Give the Irish people profitable employment, and they would be loyal, contented, and happy. He did not think that anything could promote again the industrial development of Ireland but the equalization of the laws in that country and Great Britain. As this was only a Motion to introduce a Bill, he would not trespass further on the time of the House; but at another stage he would go more fully into the question. He would only say further that when he compared the circulation of France with that of Ireland, after making allowance for the difference of population, his wonder was that Ireland made any progress at all. He hoped they would now take steps to put Ireland right, and he believed she never would be right till she had equal laws with England. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in his Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to equalise the Money Laws of England and Ireland, by extending to Ireland the provisions of the Act seventh George the Fourth, chapter six, "To prohibit the issuing of Promissory Notes under a limited sum."

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. DELAHUNTY, Mr. BLAKE, and Mr. DAWSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 16.]

LEAVE: FIRST READING.

MR. BAINES, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law of Libel, said, it would not be necessary to describe the nature of this measure, except simply to remind the House that it was the same in substance as that introduced by the Judge Advocate (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) in two previous Sessions. In 1867 he carried the measure through by large majorities, and in 1868 it was withdrawn, after passing some of its stages, in consequence of the pressure of other business. Though prevented from taking personal charge of the Bill, by being connected with the Government, it was satisfactory to know that his hon. and learned Friend would lend all the help in his power to secure the passing of the measure through this House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law of Libel, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BAINES, Mr. CANDLES, and Mr. MONLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 17.]

THAMES EMBANKMENT—PROPOSED VIADUCT.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

LORD ELCHO, in rising to move the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the Roadway and Viaduct proposed to be made on the Thames Embankment from Hungerford Bridge to Wellington Street, Strand, and whether the site might not be more advantageously occupied by some Public Building; also to inquire whether any, and if so what, controlling power over Public Works in the Metropolis, is vested in and exercised by any Government Department, said, he omitted from his Motion the words directing the Committee to inquire whether it might be desirable to establish some such controlling power, as it was thought that they pledged the House to an opinion on the point; but he left them out on the understanding that the Committee would not be debarred from considering and reporting on that subject.

MR. TITE said, the Metropolitan Board of Works had no feeling in respect to this matter but to do what was right, and what would best serve the interests of the public. The project objected to was none of theirs; but, at the same time, he thought that it had been very much misunderstood. The original Question of the noble Lord had reference to some Viaduct from Charing Cross. ["No!"] There certainly had been an impression that the Metropolitan Board of Works intended to build a Viaduct from Charing Cross to Waterloo Bridge. Now, they had no power to interfere with Charing Cross, and they never entertained the intention of making a Viaduct either from that point or anywhere else. The simple fact was this:—The Embankment from Westminster Bridge to Blackfriars was about a mile long and 100 feet wide, and it would be strange if such a road should exist, running parallel to Fleet Street and the Strand, without proper communications with those thoroughfares. However, if the noble Lord's Committee chose to take upon themselves to stop the proposed Viaduct from Hungerford Bridge to Wellington Street, Strand, the Board of Works would not be sorry, for they would then be saved the expenditure of £230,000. The arching upon the proposed road was only 270 feet long; this extent, forced upon the Board by the Government, who were the owners of certain land west of Waterloo Bridge, the object being not to interfere with two graveyards containing the remains, as it was alleged, of some of our early Sovereigns, about whose remains apprehensions appeared to be entertained in the very highest quarters. The question was how the communication with the Strand should be made; and, if it could be shown that a road a mile long required no lateral communication, the Board would be glad; but without such communication a man who wanted to go by the Embankment from Westminster to the new Courts of Law must go to Blackfriars Bridge and back to Carey Street. He agreed that some sort of control like that mentioned by the noble Lord ought to exist; and the Institute of Architects, of which he was President, would, he was sure, feel flattered if their opinion could be sought upon questions of this kind. But he could not admit that any serious mistakes had been made in the improvement of the metropolis. On the contrary, he thought that the Corporation had done exceedingly well, for it had placed itself in the hands of Sir Robert Smirke, and had loyally carried out his suggestions. It was said that these improvements were paid for out of the rates. The fact was, that they were paid out of the proportion of the coal tax which the Board of Works received, the City having 4*d.* per ton, and the Board 9*d.*, on all coal brought into London. This source of revenue would cease, he believed, in 1888, by which time the outlay on these works, including the £230,000, would be entirely covered. He supported the appointment of a Committee.

MR. LAYARD said, the Government had no objection to the proposed Committee. His hon. Friend (Mr. Tite) was mistaken in supposing that the noble Lord had referred to any Viaduct at Charing Cross; he alluded to the proposed road from the first arch of Hungerford Bridge to Wellington Place, which would be partly a road running parallel to the Embankment and partly a viaduct.

LORD ELCHO feared that he had been misunderstood. He found no fault whatever with the Metropolitan Board of Works. Indeed, he held them to be perfectly blameless in the matter. He simply asked that a Committee might be appointed to inquire into the necessity of the road, and to see whether, by a different arrangement, the fine site could not be kept as an ornament to the metropolis.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Roadway and Viaduct proposed to be made on the Thames Embankment from Hungerford Bridge to Wellington Street, Strand, and whether the site might not be more advantageously occupied by some Public Building; also to inquire whether any, and if so what, controlling power over Public Works in the Metropolis is vested in and exercised by any Government Department."—(Lord Elcho.)

And, on March 2, Committee nominated as follows:—Lord ELCHO, Mr. LAYARD, Mr. WILLIAM COWPER, Lord JOHN MANNERS, Mr. BENTINCK, Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. TITE, Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Mr. GREGORY, Mr. BERRSFORD HOPE, Mr. BUXTON, Viscount BURY, Captain DAWSON-DAMER, Viscount SANDON, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. Alderman LAWRENCE, and Mr. DILKE:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

SUPPLY.

Resolution, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty," reported, and agreed to, Nemine Contradicente.

Select Committee on Standing Orders nominated:—Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. CHARLES HOWARD, Mr. LEFROY, Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, The O'CONOR DON, Colonel WILSON PATTEN, Mr. SCOURFIELD, and Mr. WHITBREAD.

SELECTION.

LEAVE.

MR. M'LAREN, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish the Annuity Tax, or Ministers' Money, in the parish of Canongate, within Edinburgh, and to make other provisions respecting the stipend of the Minister in that parish, and of the Ministers in the city parishes said, he understood that the usual courtesy would be extended to him on that occasion, and that no opposition would be offered to the introduction of the Bill. He would not therefore take up the time of the House by making any statement in reference to the details of the measure he introduced. He would merely take that opportunity of saying, in one sentence, that the Bill he now asked leave to bring in had been modified considerably from that of last year; and that he hoped that when the Bill was printed, and hon. Members had made themselves acquainted with its contents, those who opposed the Bill of last year would be induced to give the present Bill their hearty support. The Bill had now been approved by twenty-eight members of the Magistracy and Town Council of Edinburgh—only six having voted against it. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. MILLER seconded the Motion.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he did not rise to oppose the introduction of the Bill; but he must express his astonishment, after what took place last Session, when the Bill introduced by the hon. Member was thrown out, after considerable debate in the House, that he should now propose to bring in a measure nearly identical in character with that which he formerly proposed. Last year, immediately after the rejection of that Bill, the hon. Member for Edinburgh introduced a second measure to abolish the municipal rate of a 1*d.* in the pound, imposed by the Act of 1860, as a compensation to the city creditors in lieu of seat rents handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. That was a right and proper thing to do, if it were generally admitted that the city's funds were in such a state that they could well afford to do without the 1*d.*, but he (Sir Graham Montgomery) contended that the proper course for the hon. Member to pursue now was to bring in a Bill to abolish the 3*d.* police rate or clerico-police tax as it was sometimes called, which was very much complained of in regard to the city of Edinburgh, and more especially as he thought it would be found on inquiry that they already had a surplus fund, which could be devoted to the purpose to which the 3*d.* tax was at present applied. He did think it would be much fairer to all parties if, instead of attempting to upset the settlement come to in 1860 by an Act to be passed this Session, the hon. Member would propose to abolish the rate which was so much objected to; and he understood the Corporation of the City of Edinburgh were quite in a position to do without it. He did trust the House would not consent to any meddling with the Bonds of Annuity which were imposed by the Act of 1860 upon the city of Edinburgh, and which Bonds of Annuity were a security to the ministers of the Church for the payment of their stipends. Considering everything that took place on the last occasion on which the Bill was introduced, he trusted the House would not consent to any proposition of that nature. With regard to the Annuity Tax on the Canongate, which he admitted at that moment might be considered as a small grievance, it was to be remembered that the whole amount of that tax was only £250 a year. It used to be levied at the rate of 10*d.* in the pound. It was now only levied at the rate of 3*d.* The Session before last, a Bill, which he had the honour of introducing, was passed reducing that tax from 10*d.* to 3*d.*, and in passing which, he must confess, he was to a great extent assisted by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, and was much indebted to him for that assistance. Having, however, had the honour of carrying that Bill through Parliament, and constituting, as it did in his opinion, a settlement of the question as regarded the Canongate, he must confess he should be very much opposed to disturbing the two settlements to which he had alluded—namely, the settlement under the Act of 1860, and that of the Session before last with respect to the Canongate; for he believed that most, if not all, of the parties who were concerned in the matter generally understood that that measure was to be a settlement of the question. He did say, then, that it was not right that the hon. Member should attempt, Session after Session, to legislate in the manner he now proposed in regard to that question.

Mr. M'LAREN said, he might, perhaps, be permitted to say a word in explanation of the objection made by the hon. Baronet. His speech had shown the inconvenience of discussing a Bill with the provisions of which he must be necessarily unacquainted, since it had not yet been printed. If the hon. Baronet had waited until the Bill had been printed and in the hands of Members, he would have found that one of the clauses proposed to reduce the 3*d.* rate, to effect which object the hon. Baronet had recommended him to ask for leave to introduce a Bill. The hon. Baronet was in error in supposing that he (Mr. M'Laren) was at all instrumental in having laid on the 1*d.* municipal rate in 1860. On the contrary, he was one of the 14,000 petitioners against that rate being laid on; and it was carried through the House in spite of the strenuous opposition of the inhabitants of Edinburgh, whom he had now the honour to represent. Again, as to the Annuity Tax Bill of last year, the hon. Baronet had himself furnished the strongest argument for its repeal; for, if a direct tax, levied in a parish containing 12,000 inhabitants, produced only £250 a-year, surely no better reason could be advanced for abolishing so pitiful a tax for the support of the Church, and which was the cause of much annoyance to persons who did not belong to the Church; for in that parish a very large proportion of the inhabitants were Roman Catholics. It was one of the poorest parishes in the city, and he said it was as unjust to levy £300 as it was to levy £3,000, so far as the principle was concerned. No doubt he was very willing the Session before last to assist in reducing the rate from 10*d.* to 3*d.*; but, at the same time, he informed the right hon. Gentleman (the Lord Advocate) who had charge of the Bill, that although he assented to that measure as an instalment, it should not prevent him from endeavouring to obtain the repeal of the whole tax during the present or any future Session; and the Lord Advocate said that he quite understood that to be his (Mr. M'Laren's) position. He thought those facts were all that it was necessary for him to state until he asked the House to read the Bill a second time; and he hoped meanwhile that the hon. Baronet, when he had seen the clauses of the measure, would be much better pleased with it than he now seemed to be. He would tell him that if he should feel disposed to appeal to the Town Council of Edinburgh for information in regard to the question of finance, he would find that his information was altogether erroneous, and that no such adequate surplus as he had referred to, at the present moment, existed.

COLONEL SYKES remarked that this was another instance of the evil from which they had suffered on the preceding evening, by which the time of the House was taken up in prematurely discussing measures with the particulars of which they were unacquainted.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to abolish the Annuity Tax, or Ministers' Money, in the parish of Canongate, within Edinburgh, and to make other provisions respecting the stipend of the Minister in that parish, and of the Ministers in the city parishes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'LAREN, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. CRUM EWING.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. M'MAHON, Bill for the assimilation of the Law for the Relief of the Poor in Ireland to that of England, by substituting a Union Rating for the present system of Rating by Electoral Divisions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'MAHON, Mr. BLAKE, Mr. DOWNING, and Mr. STACPOOLE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 18.]

House adjourned at a quarter

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

Mr. M'Laren

My Lords,

"I thank you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address.

At a time when the enlarged enfranchisement of My people gives additional weight to the deliberations of the Legislature, I rely with confidence on the advice and assistance of the House of Lords."

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD asked, Whether it was the intention of the Government to propose the extension of the Contagious Diseases Act, 1866? He hoped they would have the courage to apply the Act to the City of London.

THE EARL OF MORLEY replied, that the subject had been under the consideration of the Home Office, and that a Bill would shortly be introduced, based on the recommendations of the Select Committee which inquired into the subject last year.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

LORD REDESDALE said, that this being the first time he had been able to attend the House since Parliament had re-assembled, he desired to thank their Lordships for his re-election as Chairman of Committees during his absence, and expressed his hope that the favour and confidence extended to him during so many former Sessions would be still shown him. The noble Lord then gave Notice for to-morrow week of a Motion for a Return of all Acts of Parliament by which property had been taken from individuals, corporations, or trusts without their consent and without securing to them full compensation, or without offence being charged against them justifying such confiscation.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL

PRESENTED. READ A FIRST TIME.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I rise to lay on your Lordships' table, a Bill to extend and improve the Parochial Schools of Scotland, and to make further provision for the Education of the People of Scotland. It is not usual in your Lordships' House, on the occasion of the introduction of a Bill, to make any statement or explanation as to its contents; but in the present case I think that course necessary, and mainly for the reason that the Bill itself does not contain the whole scheme of the Government:—so that if the Bill were laid on the table, and circulated without any explanation of those parts of the scheme which lie outside the measure, considerable misunderstanding might arise as to its scope, and as to the intentions of the Government. In 1864, as your Lordships are aware, a Royal Commission was appointed by the Crown to inquire into the system of Scotch Education; and of that Commission I had the honour to be Chairman. It was composed of men of all political parties, and of almost all religious parties, interested in the cause of education in Scotland. It was pretty equally divided, so far as politics were concerned, between the Conservative and the Liberal parties, and contained members and representatives of the Established Church, of the Free Church, of the United Presbyterian Church, of the Episcopal Church, and lastly, of a school very powerful in Scotland in regard to education—the supporters of purely secular education. The Bill is substantially the Bill which was unanimously recommended by the Commission of 1864. I say substantially, because some minor modifications and alterations have been made in its provisions; but in its main principles it is the Bill of the Commission. In now approaching the consideration of the proposed measure, those new provisions are these to which I propose more particularly to refer. Those of your Lordships who are interested in the subject of education in Scotland will remember this important fact—that compulsory rating for the support of education has, for many generations, been the law of Scotland. We have a national system of education properly so called, entirely different from any which has hitherto existed in England, namely, a system of education and rating by Parliamentary authority—the parochial system of schools supported by rates, which are imposed by Parliamentary authority on the owners and occupiers of property. The salaries of the schoolmasters are regulated by law, and those salaries are raised by rates imposed by law. Your Lordships may naturally ask, if that be the case, what are the defects we desire to remedy in the existing system of education in Scotland? I will explain that in very few words. In the first place, the cities and towns of Scotland were never completely under the parochial system, and have altogether outgrown the means of education which the parochial system provides. In the second place, there are many parishes in Scotland in which the growth of the population has been so enormous that the parochial system has become altogether inadequate to supply the educational demands which that increase in population creates. And in the third and last place, there are and always have been many parishes which are so large in geographical extent that the parochial school, though subdivided into several branches, is wholly inadequate for the proper education of the people. There are several other defects in the existing system of education in Scotland, which I need not dwell upon. For example, imperfect provision with regard to school buildings, and—what is almost as important as any—the very imperfect provisions of the law for getting rid of bad and inefficient schoolmasters. These five great defects in the existing system we propose to deal with and to remedy by the Bill which I desire your Lordships should favourably consider. It will be obvious, from what I have said, that we cannot deal with the remedy for these defects precisely as Parliament has hitherto dealt with the parochial system of Scotland. Parishes are divisions known to the law, and it was a simple operation to enact that in every parish there should be one good and efficient school. But there are parts of parishes in which large populations have within late years arisen that are not known to the law, it is impossible in any general statute to indicate at once where new schools are required. In regard to those also it would be insufficient to enact that in every parish—in the city of Glasgow for instance—one school should be erected; and it might be inconvenient to enact that there should be more than one. All these are matters which must be determined by some authority having a full but discretionary power to go over all Scotland and say, “In this city education is defective, and you want so many more schools,” or “This parish is too large, and you require more schools.” So, in the manufacturing and mining districts, where the populations have greatly increased, new schools are required for the people. These are matters which Parliament could not undertake to deal with, except by means of a properly elected and properly constituted body, specially appointed for the purpose. That being the case, we must have some authority instituted to which Parliament will commit that full power of investigation as to the localities in which new school accommodation is required. The only point which I have heard questioned as to the Report of the Commission is as to the constitution of the authority to be vested with these large and discretionary powers. I have heard differences of opinion as to whether it should be vested in a Department of the Government in London, or in some body more particularly connected with Scotland. Now, for my own part, I cannot conceive any doubt being entertained on the question by those who have really looked into the extent and nature of the power it is proposed to intrust to this body. I have great respect for my noble Friend the President of the Council (Earl de Grey). There are few persons in England to whom I would more completely defer as a discretionary authority in such matters. I know that to some extent he is acquainted with Scotland, and that, at all events, during those two months in which Englishmen betake themselves for health of body and mind to Scotland, he occasionally honours us with his presence. But still I confess that if an ukase came from his office to me, saying "In your parish there is a great want of a school, and I desire it should be erected," I am not quite sure how I should comport myself in deference to the authority delegated to my noble Friend. It seems to me apparent that where you give such large powers, independent of parochial and municipal authorities, you must vest them in some body which is in the main Scotch, which is acquainted with the feelings and habits of the Scotch people, with the principles of their educational system, and, above all, which is of a representative character. It was on these grounds, and with these feelings, that the Commissioners unanimously recommended that a discretionary power should be vested in the Board, which was sketched in their draft Bill. I think, however, there were considerable objections to the constitution of the Board as originally sketched by the Commissioners; and, indeed, one or two of the Commissioners did dissent on that point of the constitution of the Board. We have, therefore, made an important alteration in it. There are three or four great parties or interests in Scotland who ought to be represented on such a body. In the first place, there is the interest of the proprietors of land, upon whom mainly, and almost exclusively the present burden of the parochial schools rests. In the second place, there are the interests of the burghs, over whom extensive and it may be thought arbitrary powers are given, and which ought therefore to be represented. Then, again, there are the interests of the higher education, and the opinions entertained upon the method of education by men themselves concerned in that higher education—namely, the Universities ought to be represented. I think it also necessary that the schoolmasters, who are on the whole a most respectable and intelligent body, and have done excellent service, and will be able to supply valuable information, should likewise have a voice; and, lastly, there is the Crown, which is usually represented in such Boards. That, therefore, is the constitution of the Board which we propose. We propose that the conveners of the counties of Scotland should elect two representatives, we propose that the burgh interest should elect two other representatives, and we propose that higher education should be represented by two members chosen by the Universities of Scotland, divided into those two groups into which the Parliamentary representation of those bodies is now divided. We also propose that the schoolmasters, through the organized institutions of which they are possessed, should elect one representative, and that two more, with a paid Chairman, should be nominated by the Crown. So much for the constitution of the Board. And now so far the provisions of the Bill might be very simple, and, if this were all that we should enact a very large proportion of the clauses of the Bill might altogether be dispensed with. If we had to deal with nothing but the old parochial system of Scotland, we might simply give to this Board full and discretionary powers to survey the whole of Scotland, to determine in what towns and in what parishes of towns, in what parishes and in what parts of parishes, it is absolutely necessary that new school accommodation should be provided, and we might be content to leave to that Board, in communication with the parties locally interested, full power to erect new schools where they might consider it necessary. But the matter is very much complicated by the introduction in Scotland, during recent years, of the Privy Council system of grants. That is an element foreign altogether to the ancient constitution of the parochial schools of Scotland. I do not mean to complain of the introduction of the system into Scotland. When it was determined by Parliament that out of the Imperial funds assistance should be given to local bodies in respect of education, it was impossible that Scotland should be excepted from the field of its operations. We contribute our full share to the Imperial revenues of the country, and it was but just and fair, that so far as we complied with the conditions of the Privy Council, we should be assisted in that proportion out of the general taxation of the country. But there were in Scotland special circumstances which undoubtedly brought out into very full relief the peculiar defects of the Privy Council system of grants. In the first place there was, at the very time these grants were introduced into Scotland, a very great excitement, and what I may call an exacerbation of the rivalry of ecclesiastical sects. Now, the very basis of the Privy Council grants is, that you meet local subscription by subventions from the Treasury; and local subscriptions in Scotland for particular schools were produced not merely with reference to the wants of the locality, but with regard to the desire of particular religious bodies to outstrip and rival each other in the educational management of the country. The consequence was that, to some extent, encouragement was given to schools erected out of mere denominational rivalry, and not with reference to the existing wants of the locality. I think, however—though the evidence taken by the Commissioners went far to prove that the operation of the Privy Council grants in this respect in certain localities were injurious—yet, taken as a whole, over the entire country, it could not be said that any very large proportion of the denominational schools were altogether useless for the education of the country. I can say, from my own personal observation and experience, that, in regard to a very considerable number of the schools which were erected—for example, by the Free Church—they were eminently useful in supplementing the parochial system. But, undoubtedly, in particular localities the system did stimulate and produce schools which were not otherwise required for the wants of the population. There is another inherent defect in the Privy Council system, which came out in very strong relief in Scotland, and which is coming out in strong relief in certain parts of England, and that is that you give to the richest parts of the country and withhold from the poorest. It is a necessary consequence of the principle on which the system is conducted. You give so much to aid those who subscribe in particular localities. In the richer localities the local subscriptions come forth freely and may be very large; but, in the poorer localities, where the population is much scattered and very poor, you cannot get local subscriptions, and although very often these are the very localities in which the State ought to give the greatest amount of assistance, they are precisely those in which the least help is given by the State. This is a defect inherent in the Privy Council system of grants; you cannot get rid of it so long as that principle is retained. Now, in Scotland, in a very large part of the country, the parishes are very large, the rental is very small, and the population is very poor. The result has been that you find all over the Highlands and the Hebrides of Scotland where the population is in the condition I have described, that the Privy Council system gives very little help; whereas in the richer counties, and amongst the richer population, who do not require so much assistance, a very large amount of Privy Council grants has been absorbed. I will not trouble the House on this occasion with statistics, but I may inform the House that, from the evidence produced before the Commission, it was quite apparent that this inherent defect in the Privy Council system of grants is very remarkable in the case of Scotland, and is especially evidenced in such a town as Glasgow. That city is cut in two, as your Lordships are aware, by the river Clyde, and the northern portion of Glasgow is comparatively the richer, almost all the wealthier inhabitants of the city living north of the river, and the population on the south side is very poor. Even in that small area the bad operation of the Privy Council grants has been most remarkable. A very large proportion of assistance given by the Privy Council has been absorbed by the wealthier part of the town, and hardly any has gone to the poorer suburbs. We wish to get rid, as far as Scotland is concerned, of this inherent defect in the Privy Council system—a defect which does not apply to our ancient national system, which was one intended to adapt the educational system of the State to the requirements of the various localities. But, although we desire to get rid of this defect, it is not so easy a matter to do so. A great many of the religious bodies have been enabled by these grants to build schools, and Parliament is pledged to them to a certain extent. It might happen—and probably would happen—that if you gave those schools an unlimited power of throwing themselves upon the ratepayers, they might be very glad to do so; but, on the other hand, where they are not really required by the parish it would be very hard to allow them to do so. The ratepayers might not be willing to take those schools from off the hands of the local managers: they have a right to say, “Oh, no, gentlemen; you put up these schools for your own sectarian purposes, and you have no right now to throw them upon the ratepayers of the parishes. We do not want them; they are not required by the population; and we decline altogether to take your schools from you.” Under these circumstances, we again have recourse to the powers of the Board, and we give to the Board the power of looking over the whole of Scotland, and of selecting those denominational schools which are really required for the education of the people, and of adopting them—the effect of which adoption would not be necessarily to throw them upon the rates, but to secure to them the continuance of their Parliamentary grants. But then we go further, and would offer them the power to say, “We desire to be thrown upon the rates; we desire to give up our peculiar or sectarian management, and we desire to throw them upon the common management of the parochial schools.” That, also, is a proposition which requires the assent of the other party; and several very important clauses in this Bill are intended to give the Board the power of consulting the two parties, and, where they are both agreed, of allowing those schools to be put upon the footing of parochial schools, under the management of a school committee, which is the representative of the ratepayers. In that way we hope for the future to avoid the waste of money which the Privy Council system of grants has undoubtedly occasioned in Scotland, and to apportion such funds as we may have from the Imperial taxation to the real wants and requirements of the country. There is a provision also for the future. This evil is to be stopped. There are to be no more denominational schools in Scotland after a given date—a date calculated with the view of keeping good faith with those who may have already applied for assistance and have had the promise of a subvention from the Parliamentary grant. We also propose—and this is very important—to give the central Board a very large power over the school buildings in Scotland. There is no defect in the existing system in Scotland which was more prominently brought under the notice of the Commissioners than the very great defect which exists in many parts of Scotland in regard to school building. We empower the Board to deal directly with the local parties, and to require that the school buildings in all cases shall be sufficient for the wants of the population, and the purposes for which they are built. We also propose to give to the Board full and I may say even arbitrary power with regard to the dismissal of the parochial teachers. This power is absolutely required. All previous Acts of Parliament have been practically useless for the purpose of getting rid of inefficient and bad masters. No doubt if a man is guilty of positive immorality—if you can prove him an immoral man in his life—he may be removed. But with regard to drunkenness, that is an offence exceedingly difficult to prove in Scotland. The difficulty of obtaining evidence upon that point is almost insuperable. You may ask a great many witnesses if they ever saw a certain man drunk, and their answer will be “No,” but they will qualify it by such explanations as that “You would have kenn’d he had been tasting.” It is extremely difficult to get any evidence upon that point. And so with regard to ill treatment of the children: if you can prove a master is cruel to them you can dismiss him; but for any other kind of inefficiency, complete idleness, such conduct as to estrange the affections of the people, as to prevent them from sending their children to school, you have practically now no remedy whatever. We propose to remove this, which is a great and crying evil in Scotland. I have known many cases where for years and years the highest and best interests of the population have been sacrificed to this absurd notion of some right of fee simple in the property of their offices enjoyed by schoolmasters in Scotland. We propose that the Board, in communication with the local authorities, and on receiving complaints from them, shall, as regards the masters appointed for the future, have an absolute power of dismissal for incompetency—allowing, of course, wherever the incompetence arises from physical inability or any causes not connected with moral delinquency, retiring allowances of sufficient amount. We propose also, that so far as regards the inspection of the schools, the Privy Council shall retain the power of appointing the Inspectors. We believe that the system works admirably at present, and it would be inconvenient that it should be altered. I apprehend it will be quite enough that copies of the Reports of the Inspectors should be sent to the Board in Scotland, and also that the Board should, at all times, have the power of appointing Special Inspectors with respect to any special defects which may be brought before them from particular localities. I now come to a point of great importance—I mean to certain modifications in the application of the New Code in Scotland, which, I think, we may be able to arrange with my noble Friend at the head of the Privy Council if this Bill should pass. The arrangements which are now in progress in the Office of the Privy Council must, in a great measure, depend upon the success of this measure, for, if this measure is passed by Parliament, we intend to introduce some important modifications in the application of the New Code to Scotland, based entirely on the peculiarities of our national system, and especially upon our adoption of the system of rating. The first main principle of the New Code is one which I, for my part, cordially adopt, and that is the payment by results. I think this fundamental principle is perfectly right. I think the masters and managers of schools ought to be paid according to the results of their teaching, as shown in the examination conducted by the Inspectors. This, which is the main principle of the New Code, is in no case to be departed from in Scotland. But there is another principle connected with the New Code in England which is altogether inapplicable to our peculiar condition in Scotland, and that is the distinction made between different classes of society. The theory of the New Code is, that their assistance is given only for the education of the poor, and for elementary branches of instruction only. But it has never been our habit in Scotland to divide society for educational purposes. On the contrary, it is the universal custom all over Scotland that men in very different classes of society should be educated together in the parochial schools. You will have the children of the poorest labourer sitting beside the children of the farmer who employs him, the children of the clergyman of the parish, and even in some cases of the landed gentry, sitting on the same bench and learning from the same master the same branches of instruction. It would be most injurious to the educational system of Scotland, and most unjust and inexpedient as regards the habit of the people, to make any distinction between the different classes of society. Therefore the payments of the Privy Council, measured by results, will be applied equally to all the scholars of the school, without reference to, or distinction between, the class of society to which they belong. The second modification I hope to see adopted is that some recognition should be given, within reasonable limits and under proper restrictions, to the higher branches of education. In the parish schools of Scotland we have never been accustomed to limit education to “the three R’s.” It has always been the custom of the parochial schoolmasters to teach geography, history, and very often Latin and Greek, even to the children of the poorest. I am much afraid that the proportion of the children who have gone on to those higher branches has of late years been a diminishing one; but that is still the case to a great extent, and it would be most injurious that any discouragement should be given to the practice. The third modification which we contemplate is that in regard to pupil teachers; their appointment should not be made contingent necessarily upon their attendance at normal schools, but that their attendance at the Universities, under certain restrictions hereafter to be agreed upon, should be taken as equivalent to their attendance at the normal schools. That will be a great boon to many of the poor scholars in Scotland. A very large proportion of the persons educated at the parish schools go direct from them to the University, and, while obtaining their education there, eke out their subsistence by teaching schools in the evening, after working hard all day in the University classes. Provided some guarantee is given that they really intend to pursue the profession of teachers and are keeping up some practice in teaching powers, attendance at the Universities may, I think, be taken as equivalent to their attendance at a normal school. The general principles upon which these modifications of the Privy Council Minutes are founded will be found in very general terms in the Schedule of the Bill which I now lay upon the table of the House. The first sentence of the Schedule is so important that I will read it—

“The Committee of Council, within—months after the passing of this Act shall issue a Code of Minutes and Regulations according to which the sum of money voted by Parliament for public education shall be distributed in Scotland; and the Committee in the course of each year, as occasion requires, may cancel or modify any articles of the said Code, or may establish new articles, except as hereinafter mentioned; but”—

And this is the important passage—

“But the said Code, or any alterations which shall be made thereon, shall not have any effect or operation until the same shall have been submitted to Parliament and laid on the tables of both Houses, for at least one calendar month; and such Code of Minutes and Regulations in force for the time being shall contain no directions or impose no conditions at variance with the regulations.”

Now the first regulation is the important one—

“Rule 1. The object of Parliament in voting such sum is to defray part of the cost of educating these scholars (without distinction of classes) in the national schools of Scotland, and in framing a Code of Minutes and Regulations for the distribution of such sum due care shall be taken by the said Committee that the standard of education which now exists in the parochial schools shall not be lowered, and that, as far as possible, as high a standard shall be maintained in all the national schools of Scotland.”

That Schedule regulates the spirit in which the New Code shall be framed in its application to Scotland—no distinction between classes of society, and no discouragement, but rather encouragement, to the high standard of education which has hitherto existed. There is another point to which I must refer respecting a subject of general interest, both as regards England and Scotland. Your Lordships must have been struck with the very great difference which exists between the condition of public opinion in Scotland and in England upon this great subject of popular education. I think it cannot but surprise some Members of this House to be told that a Commission, consisting of men of all political parties and of all religious denominations in Scotland, have unanimously recommended the giving to a central Board such large and arbitrary powers of imposing additional rates for educational purposes—enabling it to go to great cities like Glasgow, having an important municipal body, and direct the erection of a school in any particular street or ward. How has this great difference of feeling arisen? Your Lordships will recollect the terms in which, last year, when the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Marlborough), then President of the Council, introduced his Bill, he referred to permissive rating, the strong objections he urged to it, and how impossible he thought permissive rating in England. I really believe that if we were to propose a Bill for England, with powers of compulsory rating such as these, each particular hair on the noble Duke's head would stand on end, and I do not believe it would receive the assent of anything like the same proportion of men of all political parties in this country. The question naturally arises, how has this great difference of opinion between the two countries arisen? How is it that the people of Scotland are so anxious for education that they are willing—men of all parties and all Churches—to ask for such powers as these to be given to a central Board? The answer to the question is that this state of opinion is due to some of the great leaders of the Reformation in Scotland. The parochial system in Scotland was founded by John Knox, who laid down the principle, which has never faded from the popular mind in Scotland, that it is the duty and the function of the State to insist upon the education of the people. In language of singular eloquence and fervour, which even at this distance of 300 years, it is impossible to read without emotion, he insisted before the Parliament of Scotland that it was their absolute duty, if they desired that the light of the Reformation should be maintained in Scotland, to found a great system of national education. Nor was it a mere vague suggestion. Every part of the scheme—even that which we are now only about to adopt—was laid down in that address by Knox. He provided for the establishment of parish schools; he desired to see burgh schools for the middle classes; he desired the erection of great Colleges and Universities for the higher education to be given to the highest classes. Nay, more, he provided for annual and continual inspection, and he laid down a principle which only very lately has been acknowledged in our legislation, but which I strongly suspect is about to play an important part in the legislation of the country—that education in certain cases must even be made compulsory. That principle has been adopted by Parliament in all the Factory Acts, and in other Acts for the employment of children; it has been adopted bit by bit, slowly and quietly, and I believe there are many persons who are not at this moment aware of the extent to which our legislation is committed to that principle in England. That principle was laid down by the great Reformers of Scotland; the advantages which she has derived from her parochial system have all sprung from that source, and it is due to the memory of these men to say that this system of general education was laid down by them alone, and, so far as I know, in no other country to which the Reformation extended was it adopted in the same degree or the same importance attached to it. So far as I have been able to ascertain, no one of the English Reformers laid stress upon the education of the people, but the Reformers of Scotland alone. I believe the secret of the difference is this—that in Scotland the Reformation came from below, while in England it came from above; and hence the interests of the people were always foremost in the minds of the Scottish Reformers, and hence they derived their singular clear-sightedness on this question. It is from that source the Scottish people have derived their strong appreciation of the blessings of education. But, at the same time, I am bound in honesty to point out to this House that this Bill, in many respects, widely diverges from the principles laid down by our early Reformers. It is unquestionably true that in their time the education of Scotland was designed to be what is now called a denominational system. It was to be both national and denominational—that is to say, it was to be strictly national, but it was also to be strictly religious. Such a system was possible at that time. In the view of John Knox the whole population of the country was to be of one Church, and under these circumstances it was natural and perfectly right that the national system should be strictly denominational; that is to say, when the people were all of one religion and one Church it would be perfectly natural, and in my opinion perfectly right, that Parliament should connect education with the teaching of that Church. But, unfortunately, we are not now in the position in which John Knox was, or in which he hoped Scotland would be. For though we are not much divided in as regards doctrine, yet we are keenly divided on points of ecclesiastical discipline, and we can no longer hope for the establishment of a united system of education under any one Church. Under these circumstances I think a great step is now proposed by the system provided by this Bill—to cut off the connection between education and the conduct of particular religious bodies. The Inspectors are no longer to be necessarily members of any particular denomination, and they are not to be confined to the inspection of schools connected with any particular denomination. Above all, it is expressly provided that they are to take no cognizance of religious instruction unless the managers of the schools themselves desire such cognizance to be taken. This is an important part of the measure, and without it we could not possibly have had that assent to our measure which we have received from all parts of the country. We have full confidence that the ratepayers will conduct the new schools in respect of religious instruction much in the same way as the parish schools have been conducted. There really is no difference in the management of the different denominational schools in Scotland. It has been proved over and over again that parents do not care a halfpenny what is the religious connection of the school to which they send their children. They send them to the best school, whether that school be an Established Church school or a Free Church or an United Presbyterian school. We propose, therefore, to take no cognizance of religion in these schools. In point of principle this course is rendered all the more easy by the example set last year by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Marlborough) in recognizing, for the first time, secular schools in England as entitled to a share in the Privy Council grants. We take no notice of the religious instruction taught in any of these schools, except this, that we impose upon all the schools a stringent Conscience Clause. No public money is to be given to any school that does not submit to such a clause. But the truth is, that here also, I am glad to say, we are not met with the difficulties which prevail in England. In Scotland it has always been the custom that Roman Catholics may obtain the advantages of secular instruction at the parish schools without being compelled to go through the religious teaching. The same system has been universally adopted in the Free Church, and in every other—except, as I have been informed, though I hope it is not true, that the Episcopal Church will not allow secular instruction to be given in their schools without the pupils going through the catechisms of their Church. But, having thus given a general view of the principles of the Bill, I will not go further into details at present. At the proper time, and at a future stage—which I hope, as the Bill has received the assent of men of all parties, may be on going into Committee, which I propose to do after the Easter holidays—I shall be able to explain it more in detail, and I hope that the measure will finally receive the sanction of Parliament. In the meantime I would make one earnest appeal to the different religious bodies of Scotland to lay aside their minor differences, and to accept of this measure as on the whole a very favourable compromise. I know my countrymen well; I know the importance they attach, I think honourable, to abstract principle,—principles often so abstract, that it is difficult to get Englishmen to understand the importance attached to them. I know the tenacity with which they hold to their peculiar views, and I know that the Bill will not altogether coincide with the opinions of the extreme voluntaries or of the extreme supporters of the Established Church. I lay it on the table as a Bill embodying a reasonable compromise, and earnestly trust it will be received in the same spirit in Scotland. My firm belief is, that if it is adopted we shall confirm and extend the inestimable benefits we have already derived from our parochial system, and shall be erecting the best monument that we can raise in grateful memory of immortal names.

A Bill to extend and improve the Parochial Schools of Scotland, and to make further provision for the education of the people of Scotland—Was presented by The Duke of ARGYLL; read 1st. (No. 11.)

METROPOLIS GAS BILLS.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS moved, "That the Imperial Gas Bill and the Bills of all other Companies supplying the Metropolis with Gas be referred to the same Committee." The hon. Member said, the object was to secure consistency of legislation and the protection of the consumer.

MR. LOCKE, in supporting the Motion, called the attention of the House to the Notice issued by the Board of Trade under the late Administration, from which it appeared that that Department contemplated bringing in a Bill similar to that passed last year for the Corporation of the City of London, and which would extend to the other parts of the metropolis those advantages which the City now enjoyed. The Act of the City Corporation had been of great benefit; it had lowered the price and improved the quality of the gas. At the same time it required alterations and additions, and therefore the Board of Trade issued a Notice on the 14th November last indicating their intention of bringing in a Bill to extend provisions similar to those of the City Corporation Act to the whole of the metropolis, and to enlarge and improve those provisions. He presumed that Bill when brought in would be referred to a Select Committee, and therefore it would be most prudent to prevent this Imperial Gas Bill from being taken into a Committee by itself, and to send it to the same Committee which would have to consider the Bill of the Board of Trade. A Committee on this subject, as far back as 1867, had concluded their Report with these words—

“ Unless the Companies are prepared during the Recess to consent to such an arrangement (the one suggested by the Committee), your Committee think that every facility should be afforded to the local authorities of the metropolis in the Session of 1868 for the introduction of an independent supply.”

Advantage was taken of that recommendation by the Corporation of the City of London, but not by the Metropolitan Board of Works, who had no funds at their disposal to carry out such a project.

MR. BRIGHT said, the Notice given by the Board of Trade, some time before he joined the Government, was not given with any positive determination to introduce a Bill, but rather with the view of leaving the Department at liberty to determine what should be done when the House assembled. The matter had been discussed most fully since he became connected with the Board, and the conclusion arrived at was not to bring in any Bill on their part as a consequence of the Notice. The Bill now under consideration was the only one of great importance that was likely to come before the House this Session on behalf of the Gas Companies. It was a Bill by which it was proposed to raise a large amount of capital, and it was one, no doubt, that would require very careful consideration by the Committee to which it would be referred. In this case, as in most others, the Committee would be called upon to ascertain that not more than a necessary amount of capital was to be raised, and that security was taken that the capital should be duly and properly expended. It was true that in 1867 a Committee recommended that every facility should be afforded to the local authorities of the metropolis in the Session of 1868 for the introduction of an independent supply, but, unfortunately, in the metropolis, with the exception of the City of London, there did not appear to be any authority to whom the supply of gas could be wisely confided. The Metropolitan Board was really the only body, and they at present, for a variety of reasons, did not consider it desirable that the supply of gas should be undertaken by them. He took it for granted that, if the Metropolitan Board had the power to supply the metropolis with gas, they would not establish new works at any one place, but would arrange for the transfer to them of the pipes already laid, and the works already established. The Board, however, was not at present in a condition to undertake the duty, and in all probability its constitution would have to be reviewed by Parliament before so great a change was made. Under these circumstances he was unwilling to, as he thought, harass the Gas Companies by constant opposition in Parliament, when the Department was not prepared with any distinct policy which it could recommend to the House. There could be no objection to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. T. Chambers) that the Gas Bills be referred to the same Committee.

MR. BREWER said, one of the great difficulties under which the metropolis outside the City of London laboured was, that by the Local Management Act there was no power given to any local body to come to Parliament for those advantages which the Select Committee of 1867 thought ought to be conceded to the ratepayers, who were compelled, therefore, to rely upon the Government.

COLONEL SYKES said, gas was now supplied to the metropolis by companies which had been in the habit of dividing 10 per cent profits. The object of this Bill was to reduce those dividends, and this might be quite right; but they had been made the subject of family settlements, and if they were altered without due and careful provision, families might, in consequence, be reduced to ruin.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to correct an erroneous impression that the local authorities had no right to interfere in these questions. Some time ago the Standing Orders of the House were altered so as to allow the local authorities of the metropolis to appear against any Bill affecting the interests of which they had charge, and by their Act of Parliament they had power to take any proceedings they thought necessary for the interests of the inhabitants of the metropolis. They had power, therefore, for the protection of the inhabitants, if they chose to exercise it; but he was sorry to say that the local authorities of the metropolis rather avoided duties which they might very well perform, and endeavoured to throw them as much as possible upon the Government of the day.

Motion agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT, 1866.

QUESTION.

MR. MITFORD said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If Her Majesty's Government will propose to Parliament any extension of the "Contagious Diseases Act, 1866," to places not mentioned in the first Schedule of that Act?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that Government had under their consideration the course to be taken with respect to that Act, and would in a short time state the conclusion at which they had arrived.

IRELAND—MEDICAL AND EDUCATIONAL CHARGES.—QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, in accordance with the pledge given that the Irish Unions should be relieved of half the Medical and the whole of their Educational Charges, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to add the deficiency of the sum voted last year for that purpose to the Estimate of the present year?

MR. AYRTON said, the facts were not exactly as suggested by the Question of the hon. Member. He had made inquiry into the subject, and the arrangements adopted, as far as he understood, were that an Estimate should be made at the beginning of the year of the sum that would be required to meet the charges in each of the unions, and if at the end of the year that Estimate was exceeded, the Treasury should not pay the excess; but if the expenditure was less than the Estimate then the actual charge only should be paid by the Treasury. In accordance with that arrangement no application has been made to the Treasury for any further claim, and the subject had not been brought under their consideration.

CONSTITUTION OF THE BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any changes have been made in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty or Coast Guard Office since the accession of the present Government to Office; whether the changes, if any, have involved any increase of salaries; have led to any resignations and to the granting of pensions; whether any clerks in the Office who had obtained their appointments by competitive examination or otherwise have been discharged; and, if so, what compensation has been awarded to them in consequence of their discharge; and, the number of men who have been discharged from the various Dockyards by Her Majesty's Government, their grades and occupations, and the pensions and gratuities granted to them?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to inform the House that it had been my intention to give the fullest particulars of the changes at the Board of Admiralty, and of the reductions both in the clerical and professional establishments, when I bring forward the Navy Estimates, and that I am at some disadvantage in merely answering a string of Questions without being able at some length to explain the reasons for the acts of public policy to which they refer; but I will answer them as clearly as I can. My Answer to the first Question is that the changes in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty and the Coastguard Office are the following:—Formerly the naval business was conducted by four naval officers and a civilian, acting under a First Lord, who might or might not be a civilian; and with a First Secretary, also sometimes a naval officer, carrying out their decisions, and, if the First Lord was a Peer, their representative in this House. The change which I have made is that the business of the Admiralty is conducted in the same manner as in the other principal Departments of Government. All questions relating to the personnel of the Navy are dealt with under my instructions by, and are brought before me by, the First Naval Lord, who is assisted by a Junior Naval Lord, my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ripon (Lord John Hay); all questions relating to the dockyards, to stores, and to manufactures—in fact, to the materiel of the navy, are in the same manner dealt with by the Controller of the Navy, who has the title of Third Lord. The finance of the Department—that is, the duty of separately inquiring into all questions of expenditure, whether they concern the personnel or materiel, is assigned to the Financial or Parliamentary Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), assisted by the Civil Lord. Each of these Officers is responsible to me, in the same manner as the Controller General and the Under Secretaries are responsible to the Secretary of State for War. The offices of Controller and Deputy Controller of the Coastguard are abolished. Their duties are assigned to the First Naval Lord, to whom a post captain has been attached for the details of this and other services. The First Naval Lord also submits to me all proposals relative to the movement of the fleets, the manning, discipline, victualling, and health of the navy. The Third Lord and Controller similarly has charge of all questions connected with the dockyards, the steam reserve, and stores; and is practically in the exact position intended by the Dockyard Commission of 1860, to be assigned to the Controller General. In answer to the second Question, I have to say that these changes have had the result of reducing the number of superior officers at the Admiralty, including the Board, from seventeen to thirteen. Their salaries and allowances (not including half-pay) which were £24,901, are now £21,000; and, instead of occupying six official houses, they only occupy three, the others being used for clerks and officers brought from Somerset House. This office accommodation is worth at least £1,200 a year, so that the saving is altogether £5,101 a year, besides the great advantage and economy of concentrating the Department. The increase of individual salaries and allowances granted in consideration of increased responsibility are that the First Sea Lord receives £1,500 a year, instead of rather more than £1,100; the Controller, who has no house, £1,700, instead of £1,300; and the Constructor £1,200, instead of £1,000. There are also some small increases in minor salaries, more than covered by reductions. In answer to the third Question, I have to say that two of the reductions are in the Board itself, and therefore led to no resignations; one, that of the Controller of the Coastguard, anticipated the natural end of his term of service by a few days; the fourth, that of the Storekeeper General, could not have been long delayed, as he had been for forty-two years in the service. His is the only pension, and he could have claimed it for some years past. Before I answer the fourth Question, as to clerks, I must remind my hon. Friend that in the Notice he gave me he spoke of the “violation on the part of Her Majesty’s Government of the implied agreement with clerks consequent on their obtaining their appointment by open competition, or otherwise.” I see now that he has omitted these words; but, as he included them in his original Notice, I feel bound to say that the only agreement between the Government and their clerks is contained in the 7th section of the Act 22 Vict. c. 26, which prescribes what compensation shall be given to a clerk, whether his service be under five, ten, twenty, or any number of years, on his office being abolished or reduced. This Act and the Treasury Minute based on it, dated the 14th of June, 1859, have been in force for ten years, and are perfectly well known to the whole Civil Service. The only duty of the Government is not to exercise its powers under the Act in a manner detrimental to the public service, or partial so far as individual officers are concerned. What has been done is this:—When the Controller's separate office was abolished it was ascertained that under the new arrangements twelve clerks and three writers would have nothing to do; and when the Coastguard separate office was abolished, that out of twenty clerks and others, only two, or at the outside three, would be wanted, the saving in the two Departments being £7,991 a year. Notices accordingly were given to these thirty-three clerks and others that after the 31st of March their services would not be required in those Departments; but they were also informed that they would receive the compensation granted by the Act, would be put on a redundant list from which all similar appointments would be made, and that this list would be communicated to the Treasury. Before I decided on the reduction in the Coastguard Office I also appointed, three weeks ago, a Committee, consisting of Lord Camperdown, my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), and Mr. Anderson, the Assistant Controller and Auditor, whose business it has been to inquire in all the Departments of the Admiralty, whether arrangements can be made under which other officers, who might be better spared, could be retired instead of some of those to whom notice had to be given. They also have to consider very large reductions which, as will be seen by the Estimates, are being made in the Accountant General's, Store, Medical, and other branches. I have authorized them to inquire throughout the Admiralty Departments in London what clerks who can be spared may be willing to retire, and I have reason to believe that few, if any, efficient clerks will be discharged against their will, the reduction being mainly among the seniors and writers, although the whole reduction of about £14,000 a year in clerical expenditure in London will be effected; and if any should be necessarily put on the redundant list, they will, if efficient, be re-appointed to the first vacancies. In reply to the last Question, I have to state that Her Majesty's present Government have discharged no men from the dockyards, although they have given notice that in October next Woolwich will be closed, and as many as possible of the men employed there transferred to other yards. To effect this it will be seen by the Estimates that the number of men will be increased by 320 at Portsmouth, 240 at Devonport, and 200 at the small yards, and no fresh appointment will be made. I hope thus to continue all the established dockyard and factory men and some of the others. If my hon. Friend's Question refers to the discharges which occurred in the present financial year before I went to the Admiralty, I have to inform him that the number of artificers and labourers discharged from Her Majesty's dockyards from March to December, 1868—including a few deaths which I have not had time to ascertain separately, and exclusive of those from Deptford, which it was decided by my predecessor to close—was 5,409, and the number of entries 780, giving a net reduction of 4,629. Of these, 325 were established men, and of them 304 received pensions, averaging £26 per man; eighty-one non-established men received gratuities averaging £21. But of these men who were discharged about 2,000 were temporarily engaged in the previous October in excess of the number provided by the Estimates of 1867-8, and they were well aware that they would only be employed for a few months. I should add that at Deptford—which is dying out as a dockyard, and will be closed on the 31st of March—sixty-one established men have been pensioned off and 111 hired men discharged.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE explained that the alteration in his Question had been made by the Clerk at the table. He also gave Notice that when the Navy Estimates came on for consideration, he would ask whether the reductions the First Lord had referred to were made in conformity with the present patents?

QUEEN'S SPEECH.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

Mr. SPEAKER reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

"I have received with satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address.

"I gladly rely on the Members of a House of Commons, elected by a greatly enlarged Constituency, to co-operate with Me in My endeavours to promote the welfare and union of My People."

CONSECRATION FEES.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the table of Fees to be taken on Consecrations and Ordinations under the provisions of the Act 30 and 31 Victoria, c. 135, which was being prepared in April last, has been submitted to the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury for their approval?

MR. AYRTON said, the table referred to had been received at the Treasury on the 23rd of this month, and was now under consideration.

THE "ALABAMA" CLAIMS.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any authentic information has been received of the rejection by the Senate of the United States of the Convention regarding the Alabama claims; and, whether he can inform the House that the Protocol regarding mutual rights of naturalization has been accepted?

MR. OTWAY, in reply, said, no authentic information had been received at the Foreign Office of the rejection by the Senate of the United States of the Convention relating to the Alabama claims. His hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury had correctly described the agreement which had been come to with respect to the mutual rights of naturalization as a "Protocol" and not a "Convention." He had no intelligence that it had either been accepted or rejected. The Report of the Naturalization Commission had been received, and had been laid by him upon the table of the House that evening.

HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY, BRITISH COLUMBIA.—QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What is the state of the Negotiation with the Hudson's Bay Company for surrendering to the Crown the rights which they claim over their territory in North America; and, whether any and what steps have been taken with a view to establish a communication by road and telegraph from the Atlantic to the Pacific, by the Red River Settlement, the River Satchkatchewan, and British Columbia?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, that negotiations were still pending between the Dominion of Canada and the Hudson's Bay Company for surrendering the rights which they claimed over their territory to the Dominion of Canada, and it would be obviously undesirable for him now to make any statement on the subject. With regard to the latter part of the Question he had to inform his hon. Friend that in 1862 communications were begun between the Imperial Government, the Canadian authorities, and the Hudson's Bay Company for establishing passenger and telegraphic communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific. These negotiations continued till 1864, and in consequence of them the Hudson's Bay Company purchased all the necessary materials for constructing the electric telegraph from the Lakes of Canada to the Pacific; but in consequence of the negotiations that were going on for the transfer to the Dominion of Canada of the whole of the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company, the other matter had not been proceeded with.

INDIA—NATIVE SCHOLARSHIPS.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, What arrangements have been made with reference to the Scholarships recently established by the Government of India for Natives of that country desirous of prosecuting their studies in England; and, whether there are any Papers on the subject which he can lay upon the Table?

MR. GRANT DUFF, in reply, said, the subject to which the Question referred was a deeply interesting one, and was still under consideration, and as soon as the Papers were in a complete form he should be happy to lay them upon the table. The House would probably be interested to know that the first competitive Scholarship conferred by the Government of India had been gained by a young native of Assam, and the Government had just been informed by the Government of Bengal that he was expected to arrive in England in a few days.

INDIA—THE NAWAB OF TONK.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table all the Papers connected with the deposition of the Nawab of Tonk; Copy of the said Nawab's application for permission to leave Benares, his present place of exile, for the purpose of visiting England, together with the grounds upon which the late Governor General refused such application; and, whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table the Letter of Professor Syed Abdoolah, dated the 19th of January last, offering remarks on the subject of Native Indian servants and others brought from India to England, and who are frequently thereafter found destitute in the streets of London; and also to explain under what circumstances the Resolution of the Bombay Government, dated the 11th of February 1846, and which required that any one bringing Asiatic or African servants to Europe should deposit certain sums of money in the Government Treasury as a guarantee for the safe return of the said servants, was repealed?

MR. GRANT DUFF, in reply, said, he had no objection to produce the Papers connected with the Nawab's deposition, but the Papers connected with his application to leave Benares had not yet been received from India. With regard to the latter part of the Question, he had to say that the resolution of the Bombay Government alluded to was, he believed, not found of much practical use, and had fallen into desuetude. The fact was that the Oriental vagrants in the streets of London were not generally dismissed servants, but adventurers or suitors who had come here on their own account. The whole of this subject, however, was of importance, and was receiving attention.

IRELAND—THE FENIAN CONVICTS. QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in the selection of those Fenian Convicts now proposed to be released, the course has been adopted usual in the remission of sentences of obtaining the approval of the Judge who tried each case?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that in ordinary cases when a memorial was presented from a prisoner for a mitigation of punishment or a free pardon, that memorial was referred to the Judge who had tried the case. But in the present instance no such memorial had been received by the Government, and the question was not considered as one respecting a mitigation of an ordinary sentence. On the contrary, it was regarded by the Government as a question to be decided by themselves and by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. What they did was to institute a most rigid examination into the case of each prisoner, and in conducting that examination they had the assistance of the Law Officers of the Crown, and more especially of the Attorney General. The examination was conducted in every case in reference to the character of the person and the circumstances of the case, and to all that came out at the trial. Having done that, Her Majesty's Government and the Lord Lieutenant were of opinion that it was their duty to decide the question solely on their own responsibility, and without inviting the Judges to share that responsibility.

INDIA—REMOVAL OF THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. DILKE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that the Governor General of India is to reside at Simla during the greater portion of the present year; and whether, if this be the case, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to remove the nominal seat of the Government of India from Calcutta to some more healthy spot?

MR. GRANT DUFF said, in reply, he had received no information whatever as to whether the Governor General intended to reside at Simla the greater part, if indeed any part, of this year. The question of the change of the nominal capital of India from Calcutta to some other place was of course a very important and interesting one, but it was right he should distinctly state that that question had not passed out of the stage of irresponsible discussion and examination, and that it was not in any form or shape, at present under the consideration of the Government.

ACCIDENTS IN COAL MINES. QUESTION.

MR. GREENE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure this Session for the further prevention of Accidents in Coal Mines?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, replied, that a Bill upon that subject was in course of preparation, and that it would before long be laid before the House.

SALISBURY GAOL—REMOVAL OF PRISONERS.—QUESTION.

DR. LUSH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, since his Letter to the Mayor of Salisbury, in which he informed him that he had advised delay in the removal of the prisoners from the Salisbury Gaol until after the Report of the Judicature Commission had been issued, he had seen reason to alter his opinion, and upon what grounds?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, in reply, that the magistrates of Wiltshire, who were the prison authorities, having come to the conclusion that one prison was sufficient for the requirements of the county, took steps to close Salisbury Gaol either wholly or partially, and to commit prisoners in future to that at Devizes. The Act of 1865, no doubt, empowered them to order commitments of any particular class of prisoners to be confined to that prison only, but a doubt arose as to whether they had power under the Act to remove those who were actually undergoing sentence in the prison it was proposed to abandon. They therefore applied to the Home Office, under the 65th section of the Act, for an Order under which such prisoners might be removed. But before that application had been made, a memorial had been presented against the abolition of Salisbury Gaol, and subsequently he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had received a deputation which opposed the granting of such Order of removal upon three grounds:—First, that a mandamus was about to be applied for, to compel the prison authorities to put Salisbury Gaol into proper repair; secondly, that it was understood that the Report of the Judicature Commission, which was shortly expected, would recommend Salisbury as the assize town for three counties, and that in such case the prison authorities would probably be ready to spend money upon it; and, thirdly, that in consequence of this expectation, the October Quarter Sessions had resolved, by a majority, to suspend further proceedings in the matter until the Report of the Judicature Commission had been published. Upon that the Home Secretary wrote a letter to the authorities of Wiltshire suggesting that the litigation and expense might be avoided if the Order for removal were deferred until the Judicature Commission should issue their Report. In answer to this letter a very influential deputation of Wiltshire magistrates waited upon the Home Secretary, and stated that a large sum of money had been already expended on the gaol at Devizes, which had been duly certified in all respects as fit for occupation; they showed that the action of the prison authorities had been consistent and uniform, pointing to the establishment of one gaol and the abolition of another; they showed that the resolution of October last had been carried by what is usually called a “snap division,” and that the proposal to ask for an Order of removal had been carried by a much larger majority in a larger court at the last Session; and they urged that very great inconvenience would be occasioned if the said Order for removal were not put in force. They gave an assurance, moreover, that whatever the Report of the Judicature Commission might be they would not be inclined to expend money on the Prison of Salisbury. The Secretary of State, therefore, felt that, as litigation and expense would evidently not be avoided by the further suspension of the Order of removal, and as the Act of Parliament intended that the local prison authorities should regulate their own affairs, it would hardly be right for him to take upon himself the responsibility of over-ruling their decision. He had given no opinion on the merits of the question, but simply carried out the decision at which the prison authorities had arrived.

METALLIFEROUS MINES.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill for the better regulation of the “Metalliferous Mines,” in accordance with the recommendations of the Mines Commission?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that the subject had received the full consideration of the Government, and though he was not prepared to say that a Bill was in actual preparation, he hoped that legislation on the subject would not be long postponed.

ASSESSED RATES BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

MR. GOSCHEN, in rising to ask leave to bring in a Bill for amending the Law with respect to Rates assessed upon Occupiers for short terms, said, it might be convenient to the House if he were to explain briefly the general principles upon which the measure was founded. He wished to be allowed to state, in the first instance, that the Government had approached this subject with an anxious desire not to interfere with the electoral machinery established by the Bill of 1867. They had considered how far they could deal with what was really a grievance affecting a very large number of ratepayers, but at the same time they did not wish to revive more than was absolutely necessary—he hoped not at all—the political discussions on the subject which took place in that House two years ago. That the matter was one of importance would not be denied by any one on either side of the House. Hon. Members opposite were as well aware as Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the great difficulties that had been experienced in many places in collecting the rates from weekly tenants; and as regarded their number, it might be in the recollection of the House that there were at least 700,000 occupiers under £10 a year, and a very great majority of those 700,000 were weekly tenants, by which he meant tenants for short terms, or less than a quarter of a year. He was not now speaking of tenants above or below any particular line—above £6 or below it—but of weekly tenants in general, and he wished to put as briefly as possible the position in which those tenants stand. The real point of their difficulty was this—that rates were levied, not for past expenditure, but for expenditure to come—that they were levied to cover a certain period in advance. In many places rates were levied for the year, in other places for six months, and seldom for less than a quarter. If, therefore, they assessed a tenant for short terms to these rates, they came to this position—that they taxed the weekly tenant in advance for a time materially longer than his own occupation. They went to him and said, “You must pay the rate for six months in advance, though your landlord may turn you to-morrow out of doors.” It had been said in “another place” that the grievance had not been ascertained and proved; but he thought it stood to reason that there was great hardship in coming to any one, rich or poor, and telling him he was to clear his tenement of rates several months in advance, though he might be called upon to leave the tenement the day after. He did not see that the question of furnished or unfurnished apartments made any great difference, because, though the richer classes found it difficult to remove their furniture, that was not the case with the poorer classes. But what would be said if any one taking furnished apartments for a fortnight were asked to pay the rates of the house for twelve months to come? Well, that was the precise position in which the great majority of the weekly tenants stood. And there was this further peculiarity in the case, that under many local Acts the overseers had not got it in their power legally to levy the rates by instalments. They might make arrangements voluntarily to do so, but if they had to summon a ratepayer they must summon for the whole rate. That was a part of the grievance which had created a certain sense of wrong among a very large class of ratepayers, for they said they were not asked to pay a rate levied on them simply for the term of their occupation, but a large lump sum for six months or twelve months together. The Government looked on this question not as a political one, but simply in this light—whether, if a remedy could be found, they were to allow a vast number of weekly tenants to be left in their present position. If it was said that this was an old grievance—that the rate was demanded from weekly tenants in advance, even before composition was introduced or the Reform Bill passed, that was very true, but composition was introduced many years ago with the very object of meeting this grievance. Formerly the rates used to be made for much shorter terms, but latterly, especially in the larger towns, where there were such vast numbers of ratepayers, it had become the custom to levy them quarterly or half yearly, in order to avoid the additional expense of collecting them if levied more frequently.

By the statute of Elizabeth the rates were to be levied weekly, and then it was proper that weekly tenants should pay. The inconvenience of weekly collection, however, soon came to be felt, but then it was the hardship to the owner, not the weekly tenant, that was taken into consideration, and composition was introduced for the sake of the parish and the owners, as was apparent from the preamble of the various Bills for rating the owners. He thought if the House took the question of local taxation in hand they would feel it quite right to consider this matter fully, quite regardless of the Bill of 1867. He held that the Government might challenge the House on this question, irrespective of any political considerations. Circulars had been issued from the Poor Law Board and the Home Office under the late Government with reference to the great number of summonses issued for rates, and also to the payment of rates by the owners in lieu of the tenants; and the House would remember that on various occasions when rates had been levied in the large towns they had seen reports in the newspapers of the vast number of summonses issued, and also of excusals from rates in consequence of the recent change in the law. Taking the East of London, in the spring of 1868, in Shoreditch there were 15,000 summonses issued; in Bethnal Green and Mile End the case was much the same; in Hackney the number issued was 6,000—the hearing of the whole of them being fixed for the same day; and in Lambeth the number was 7,000. Again, in Birmingham in October, 1867, there were 25,000 persons summoned, and in May, 1868, 15,000, the number of warrants of distress being 5,000, and the cost to Birmingham of the proceedings upwards of £3,000. Such was the case in regard to the inconvenience to the tenant. He asked the House whether it was expedient or desirable, in a public point of view, that there should be that enormous number of summonses and excusals? Was it desirable that there should be every kind of evasion of the law in order to turn the corner of an Act which it was so difficult to carry into execution. It was found so difficult to collect the rates from the tenants that, in many instances by a mutual understanding, the owners continued to pay them for the tenants, and he was sure that

hon. Gentlemen opposite would not deny that that was a convenient arrangement, and one which ought not to be interfered with. He might quote the authority of the late President of the Poor Law Board, who issued a Circular to the overseers of the various parishes to this effect—

“The Board desires to remark that, except in regard to the provision whereby owners were sometimes liable to be rated in the place of the occupiers of houses and tenements, the law according to which the poor rate is made, levied, and collected, as it existed before the passing of the Act, is unchanged. It follows in their opinion that, as heretofore, the payment of the poor rate need not have been made by the person assessed himself, but the payment by an authorized agent acting for him would have been sufficient, so, notwithstanding the provisions of this Act, the rate may be paid by any other person on behalf of the person rated, if duly authorized by such last mentioned person to make the payment; and they think that the overseer will not be justified in refusing to receive the payment of the rate when so tendered or to give a receipt for it. The several cases of “Rex v. Bridgewater,” 3 T. R., 550; “Q. v. Benjoworth,” 3 B. and E., 637; and “Q. v. The Mayor of Bridgnorth,” 10 Ad. and E., 66, show that the person who pays the rate for the person assessed must have authority from him for making such payment, either express or implied.”

That Circular showed that at present the landlords practically paid the rates for the tenants in a vast number of cases. He had himself received several deputations of overseers from the East of London, and when he asked them by whom the rates in their unions and parishes were paid, in nearly every case they replied, the owners. He asked them how they managed it, and they answered that they practically made the owners pay, because they told the owners that otherwise they should have to harass their tenants weekly to get the rates, and the owners felt that that would be such a hardship to their tenants that they practically undertook to pay for them. He said to the overseers, “Of course you do not pay a commission for this to the landlord, because that would be illegal?” They answered “No.” Then he asked, “How do you indemnify the owners?” and the reply was, “By lowering the assessment of the houses.” Thus by what he called a kind of collusion, the Act had really become inoperative. They went to the tenants, and not getting the rates from them, they entered into a sort of half illegal arrangement with the landlords, and the occupiers did not practically pay the rates. The change which he now proposed was not at all violent, but went on the acknowledged principle that payment by the landlord was practically payment by the tenant, if the former was authorized by the latter to pay. That being the state of the case, it was most desirable to remove the evils that had arisen in respect to summonses, and also to excusals, which had attained an unprecedented scale since the passing of the Act of 1867. The Circular issued by the Home Office showed that that Department was as alive as the Poor Law Board to the great difficulties connected with that Act. The Circular of the Home Office stated—

“I am directed by Mr. Secretary Hardy to state, for the information of the Justices for whom you are acting as clerk, that, in consequence of the large number of summonses for the recovery of rates which have been issued in certain boroughs in which, prior to the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, the system of compounding was in force, his attention has been directed to the mode of excusing poor persons from the payment of rates on the ground of poverty, under the authority conferred upon the Justices by the Act 54 Geo. III., c. 170, s. 11.”

The Circular then pointed to the mode in which summonses had been issued and excuses allowed, and suggested certain alterations in procedure. Surely it was better to try to avoid those excusals, by which some kinds of property escaped from rates, while they also added to the grievance of those weekly tenants who did pay by making them pay for others who were excused; for, of course, the more persons they excused, the greater in proportion was the burden thrown upon all who really had to pay. He was sure he was not using too strong language if he said that the present mode of collecting rates from weekly tenants was unjust in principle, and demoralizing in practice, tempting them, on the one hand, to evade the law, and exasperating them when they could not do so. These were the reasons which induced the Government to think it was absolutely necessary to legislate on the subject, and he was sure that if the late Government had remained in Office they would have thought the same thing. It would be remembered that a Select Committee sat upon that subject last year to inquire into the operation of that Act; and that Committee agreed to certain recommendations, some of which he thought were valuable, while with others of them he confessed he could not agree. But their Report showed that it was necessary to do something in the matter, which could not be left on its present footing. It would be impossible to deal with the whole question of rating this year and carry out all the improvements in it which were desirable; but this matter, he thought, might be set right by a very simple arrangement. He would now describe what the Government proposed to do. They did not propose to touch the Reform Bill or the electoral machinery. They thought it would be unwise at present to raise the question as to whether the rate-book should be the register. The rate-book had remained as the basis of the register under the Representation of the People Act of 1867, and it would remain as its basis under the Bill which he now proposed. The chief point seemed to him to be this—that they should accept the principle that it would be wiser to call on the landlords rather than the tenants to bear the ultimate burden of the rates. Therefore they proposed that the occupiers of tenements held for short terms should still continue to be rated, and be liable to pay the rates, with their names on the rate-book, but that they should be allowed to deduct the rate they paid from the rents due, or accruing due, to their landlords. That would be the first proposal of the Bill. But then it might be said that as the rate they would collect might exceed the rent which the tenant would have to pay, it might be difficult to carry out that which he regarded as the principle of the Bill,—namely, that no weekly tenant should be called upon to pay rates for a longer term than that of his occupation. Therefore it would be necessary to have a second stipulation for dividing the rate into instalments. They proposed that the overseers should not be entitled to collect more than a quarter's rate from weekly tenants, and that such tenants should not be required to pay more of the rates than would be covered by two weeks' rent. Thus, as those tenants must have two weeks' notice, in no case would they be out of pocket for the rate levied from them. The incidence of the rate, even if very heavy, was never likely to be so great but that a quarter's rate would be covered by a fortnight's rent; and in that way he thought the grievances of the extent it was already the law in Scotland and Ireland. In both those countries a certain portion of the rate was put on the landlord, and therefore the principle that the landlord might fairly be made liable for the payment of rates was acknowledged. Upon what principle, then, were the rates collected? In Scotland the method adopted was as follows:—The 43rd section of the Act 8 & 9 Vict., c. 83, passed in 1845, provided—

“Where the One Half of any Assessment is imposed upon the Owners, and the other Half on the Tenants or Occupiers of Lands and Heritages, it shall be competent for the Collector of such Assessment to levy the whole thereof from the Tenants or Occupants, who shall be entitled to recover One Half thereof from the Owners, or to retain the same out of their Rents, on Production of a Receipt granted by the Collector of such Assessment.”

In Ireland the same system prevailed. By sections 71 and 74 of the Act 1 & 2 Vict., c. 56, it was enacted as follows:—

“Every Rate made under the authority of this Act shall be paid to the Person authorized to collect the same by the Person in the actual Occupation of the rateable Property at the Time of the Rate made, and, on his Default, then by the Person subsequently in the Occupation of the rateable Property from whom such rate shall be demanded. Where the Person occupying such Property shall be liable to pay a Rent in respect of the same, he may deduct from such Rent for each Pound of the Rent which he shall be liable so to pay One Half of the Sum which he shall have paid as Rate in respect of each Pound of the net annual Value (whether such Rent shall be greater or less than such net annual Value), and so in proportion for any Sum less than a Pound.”

The House would see, therefore, that the Government were by no means pursuing an unprecedented course in proposing that the landlord should be made liable in the ultimate resort for the rates on certain kinds of property. Quite irrespective of the passing of the Reform Act of 1867, the weekly tenants, the parishes, and the owners of property would be benefited by the proposed change, and would, in fact, be placed in a better position than they occupied prior to the passing of that Act. And here he ought to state that the Bill would not be confined to Parliamentary boroughs, as all weekly tenants ought to be entitled to the same privileges. The House would remember that composition had only been abolished in Parliamentary boroughs, and in them only in respect of certain rates, as he believed that the district rate and the highway rate, when not collected with the poor rate, might still be compounded for, while beyond the area of Parliamentary boroughs the old system of composition remained in full force. Now, the Government had anxiously considered the question, whether the method of deduction introduced by the Bill could co-exist with composition in those places where composition had not been yet abolished. It appeared to the Government that it could, because, as weekly tenants would be entitled to deduct the rates from the rent after they had been called upon to pay them, and as under the composition system they were not so called upon to pay them, that portion of the Bill would not apply to places where the compounding system obtained. It was true that the sections providing that a reduction should be made in the case of property let to weekly tenants in the gross estimated rental of such property would apply universally; but it would, of course, be competent for the local authorities, in places where compositions still existed, to lower the deductions, and to say that the only deduction allowable should be that in respect of empty houses, as the liability of the owners was already considered in the general deduction of 25 per cent. It might, perhaps, be said, however, that it would have been better for the Government to deal with the subject of composition generally; but opinions varied so much on the subject that it had been deemed advisable to limit the operations of the present measure to the case of weekly tenants. In an economical view, the Bill would even go beyond the composition system, for it was compulsory and extended to the whole of England; it removed the burden of bearing the rates entirely from the weekly tenants, and it established, once for all, the principle that the property of the landlord, when let out in this particular way, was to be entitled to a deduction in its rateable value. The Government were thoroughly convinced that the proposed arrangement was just to all the parties concerned. When hon. Members had read the Bill they would, he trusted, agree that the Government had done their best to remedy a grievance which, as every one acknowledged, ought to be removed. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Mr. Goschen

MR. GOLDNEY said, he had endeavoured to follow the able explanations of the right hon. Gentleman, and, as far as he could perceive, the long speech which had been delivered amounted to this—that the landlords of property let to weekly tenants were ultimately to bear the burden of the rates. Now, if the object of the Bill was simply to relieve weekly tenants from the burden they now bore, why should so roundabout a machinery be devised for the purpose? Why not enact directly that landlords should pay all the rates imposed on property let out to weekly tenants? The only benefit which, in his opinion, could arise from the complicated provisions of the Bill under consideration was, the keeping the names of the tenants on the rate-books in order that the requirements of the Reform Act of 1867 might be complied with. But even if it were determined that the owner was to bear the burden, he might be assessed and the rates collected from him quarterly, while the names of the tenants might still be inserted in the rate-book. What possible necessity could there be for imposing on the overseers the burden of taking the rates from the tenants, if they were immediately afterwards to be entitled to be re-paid them by their landlords out of their rents? Instead of benefiting weekly tenants, it appeared to him that the Bill would impose an additional burden upon them by rendering necessary the payment of their rent as well as of their taxes, in order to get a qualification. The only possible benefit which could, so far as he could see, arise from the operation of the Bill was that it would provide for the overseer a property—namely, the goods of these small tenants, on which to levy the rate, if he chose to harass them by so doing. There was a good suggestion made before the Committee, which was that the owners who let their properties for a short period should be the parties rated. This seemed to be the practical effect of this measure; and if so, why should it be necessary to put such cumbrous machinery in motion to effect the purpose? He should reserve further criticism till he had seen the Bill; but he thought it went a roundabout way to accomplish the object it proposed.

MR. T. E. SMITH wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, whether it was his intention that all classes of weekly occupiers should be placed on the rate-book, irrespective of the nature of the tenements which they held? In the borough which he had the honour to represent (Tynemouth), there were 4,800 persons placed on the rate list, all of whom had paid their rates, and out of that number 2,200 had been struck off by the Revising Barrister, 1,500 of whom came within the scope of what was known as the Stamper Case, which had been decided in the Court of Common Pleas, and 700 more had been struck off because the Barrister thought they ought never to have been put upon the list. The question was investigated, whether the houses of many of those ratepayers had pantries and other conveniences, which, however desirable in other points of view, were hardly deemed to be necessary to the possession of a vote.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he did not propose to enter into details on the subject at that stage of the measure, because the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) said it was not the intention of the Government to open up the Reform question which had been settled, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman might be assured that there was no intention on his part of the House but to treat the question in a fair and impartial spirit, and candidly to examine the details. It was not his intention to import into the discussion the question of the compound-householder. He thought that the question was one which deserved earnest consideration, and he was sure that such would be accorded.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I have presented Petitions to-night from the borough of Birmingham, stating some facts bearing on this question that I should like in a sentence or two to state to the House. I do not pretend to say that the case of Birmingham requires more attention than that of other boroughs whose names I might give. For instance, my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall (Mr. C. Forster), who sits behind me, in all probability could state just as much with respect to the borough which he represents. But in the borough of Birmingham, before composition was abolished, there were 36,000 male householders, I believe, who had never in the course of their lives paid a rate. The system of compounding was so universal—in most cases it was not optional, but was enforced by law over the whole town—that every house of less value than £12, or even in some parts £15, was excused from rates so far as the occupier was concerned, the rate being paid by the owner. The distress which has prevailed since the change which has taken place has been something very great—something really to excite the sympathy of all those who have learnt the particulars. Summonses have been issued, I think, in regard to one rate for more than £15,000, and more than 5,000 distress warrants have been issued. Several thousands of persons have asked to be excused from rates, and the whole town of Birmingham has received this alteration of the law as a visitation, the severity of which has been aggravated by the belief that it was entirely needless. Now, the point of hardship to which my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board has specially referred, and to which he wishes to apply a remedy, is this—that the occupier of a house whose tenancy may last only for a week is or may be bound, and generally is bound, to pay rate for three months or for six months, and sometimes even for a longer period. That grievance, or rather that state of the law, existed in the case of Birmingham, but the evil was not felt by the people, because the system of composition afforded a complete shelter from that injustice, the tenant never being called upon to pay rates except as he paid his rent. He saw nothing of the tax-gatherer, and might leave his house in a week or a fortnight, but he never left having paid a rate for three or six months. When, therefore, the change was made two years ago the effect was to take away the whole of that shelter, and to bring upon the vast body of the householders of that town the evils, the sufferings, the obvious and notorious hardships and injustice described by my right hon. Friend on moving for leave to introduce his Bill. I think this is a matter which demands the special sympathy of the House. It is not a matter of any moment to hon. Members whether they pay a quarter's rate more or less; but to the great body of the working men of this country whose livelihood every week depends upon their weekly wages, the matter is one of very great importance. The average earnings of the working man are from 15s. to 20s., or 30s., perhaps 40s. a week. He occupies a house with three or four rooms, often with a large family. Imagine how, under the pressure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he has to lay out his small income in order to provide everything necessary for the support of that family! There is not a shilling which he earns which has not to be appropriated to some purpose in the course of the week with that object. There is hardly any surplus in vast numbers of these houses. There is no accumulated surplus in the bulk of them to meet the new demands which, in consequence of the action of Parliament two years ago, have been brought on these occupiers. And when, for the first time, the tax-gatherer came to them, having paid their weekly rents to this time, for a new charge, they could not understand why it was imposed on them. This, then, is a case which—apart from all questions of party, which influenced the House so much two years ago—demands the anxious consideration and sympathy of the House. The right hon. Gentleman, acting on behalf of the Government, has been anxious not to interfere with what has been done two years ago, and not to stir up strife on this question, which then excited so much interest. He has treated it as an economical question. He has not treated it as a question of representation, but merely as a question of valuation and payment of rate; and he wishes the House to adopt a principle which shall extend throughout the whole of the country, and which, I believe, will be even better than the system which was destroyed two years ago. The hon. Member for the city of York (Mr. J. Lowther) said, he thought it would be better to have no discussion now of this question. I am not sure that this is good advice, because I think it is very desirable that not only the Members of this House should have an opportunity for considering the Bill, but that every constituency throughout the kingdom should also have that opportunity; and I believe they will learn much from the expression of opinion on the part of Members of the House even in this first stage of the Bill. It is a question that is, at the first moment it is looked at, a little puzzling; but I must confess that the more I have considered and examined the Bill the more I think that no other proposal offers a satisfactory settlement of a question found to be embarrassing on the opposite side of the House so much as a certain basis, and that it was impossible to move it from that basis; but he (Mr. Johnston) thought that the right hon. Gentleman merely meant that it would be impossible to move it higher up, not that it would be impossible to move it lower down, or to place it on some more satisfactory footing. He could not think that the right hon. Gentleman who had been in the very van of the Reform movement could pledge himself never to re-open the question, which those who sat on those Benches, could not regard as settled.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for amending the Law with respect to Rates assessed upon Occupiers for short terms, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. SECRETARY BRUCE, and Mr. JOHN BRIGHT.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Property of Married Women, said, it was similar to one that was introduced last Session, which was read a second time and then referred to a Select Committee. That Committee reported in favour of several portions of the Bill, but recommended further inquiry; an inquiry which, owing to the lateness of the Session, could not then be made. He trusted that the Bill would be now accepted, and that the debate might be taken on the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Property of Married Women, ordered to be brought in by Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY, Mr. HEADLAM, and Mr. JACOB BRIGHT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 20.]

MARRIAGE WITH DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—LEAVE.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to legalize Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, expressed his belief that the opening of a new Parliament was the right time for the introduction of a measure which had been frequently discussed in Parliament during the last twenty years, and which, on several occasions, had been adopted by that assembly by large majorities.

Mr. CROSS said, he wished to give the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone Notice that he should feel it to be his duty to oppose the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to legalise Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, ordered to be brought in by Mr. THOMAS CHAMBERS and Mr. MORLEY.

House adjourned at a quarter after Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 26th February, 1869.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Private Bills, appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading—Lord Napier's Annuity* (15); Governor General of India* (16); Fine Arts Copyright Consolidation and Amendment* (17); Habitual Criminals (18).

THE WAR IN NEW ZEALAND.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it might be interesting to their Lordships to hear a telegram which had just been received at the Colonial Office from the Governor of New Zealand. It was dated the 18th of January, and was to the following effect. He might add that a telegram had been received from Melbourne stating that the war in New Zealand was considered to be at an end; but he could not, of course, say how far this latter opinion was to be relied on:—

"Nagatapa, the main stronghold of the rebels who perpetrated the Poverty Bay massacre, was captured by the Colonial Forces under Colonel Whitmore, on the 5th of January. Our loss did not exceed twenty-two in killed and wounded, while that of the rebels in killed, wounded, and prisoners, amounted to about 200. This success has produced a salutary effect."

HABITUAL CRIMINALS BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, as the Bill which I shall conclude by presenting to the House involves some considerable changes in the Criminal Law, I have given a general Notice that I shall call attention to Measures for the further repression of Crime, thinking it would be most convenient to your Lordships that I should at the outset explain the principles on which the Government propose to legislate, and the general scope of the Bill. In order to make the subject clearer, I will first state very briefly the history of recent legislation. In 1853, as your Lordships doubtless remember, after a very full discussion with respect to transportation, it was resolved—partly on account of the evils of the system and partly on account of the strong remonstrances of our Australian colonies to which the convicts had been sent—that it should to a considerable extent cease. An Act was accordingly passed imposing for the first time the sentence of penal servitude as a substitute for transportation in the greater number of cases. From that time, therefore, a diminution occurred in the number of convicts transported, and in a very short time transportation was limited to Western Australia and the Bermudas. Gibraltar I leave out of consideration, as the convicts are there simply employed on public works. The numbers sent to Western Australia of late years did not average more than about 460 per annum. At last, in consequence of strong remonstrances being made by the other Australian colonies, it was found necessary that transportation should entirely cease, and it was accordingly announced by Mr. Cardwell in 1865 that, after the expiration of three years, transportation would be entirely discontinued. This has been consequently carried into effect. Now, on establishing the sentence of penal servitude, it was also arranged that convicts should obtain a remission according to their conduct while undergoing their sentence, and be released under what is now termed a license, but which was better known as a ticket of leave. Considerable alarm being excited in the public mind at the number of convicts thus scattered over the country holding these tickets, a Commission, presided over by my noble Friend Lord Grey, was appointed to examine the whole question of Penal Servitude, and report whether any changes were expedient; and in 1863 the Commission issued an extremely able Report, containing several important recommendations. As this Bill, in a great measure, carries into effect the principles there laid down, I may state the substance of those recommendations. The first was that sentences of penal servitude, which had been as short as three years, should not in future be passed for shorter terms than seven years. The second was, that the principle already recognized by the law of subjecting re-convicted criminals to severer punishment should be more fully acted on. The third was, that convicts sentenced to penal servitude should be subjected, in the first place, to nine months' separate imprisonment, and then to labour on public works for the remainder of the term for which they were sentenced, but with the power of earning by industry and good conduct an abridgment of this part of their punishment. The next recommendation was, that all male convicts who were not disqualified for removal to a colony should be sent to Western Australia during the latter part of their punishment. The fifth was, that those who might be unfit to be sent there, but might earn an abridgment of their punishment, and who might consequently be discharged at home under license, should be placed under strict supervision till the expiration of the terms for which they were sentenced, and that the necessary powers should be given by law for rendering this supervision effectual. In pursuance of that Report, in 1864 an Act was passed making considerable changes in our Criminal Law, the principal being the extension of sentences of penal servitude from three years to five years, or in case of a previous conviction to not less than seven years. The provisions under which police supervision has since been carried out and the conditions under which licenses should be earned by good conduct were also laid down. It is important that the House should know the present number of convicts under these sentences, and how far they seem to have been effectual. Now, when the Act of 1864 was under consideration, great doubts were expressed whether it was possible to carry out a satisfactory system by which the good conduct of convicts and their industry when employed on public works could be so measured that they should earn an abridgment of their sentences. In those doubts I myself shared; but I am bound to say that from all the information I have been able to gain the system has been to a great extent successful. Under the late Sir Joshua Jebb, who, although a very able public servant, certainly did not succeed so well in the later as in the earlier part of his career, there were great relaxations of discipline: but under the management of Colonel Henderson, who succeeded him, it has been found possible to exact from convicts the really hard and patient industry which is necessary before they can obtain a remission of their sentences. If this good conduct and industry were measured merely by the officers who superintended them there might be some suspicion of a too favourable view being taken; but the figures I shall quote leave no doubt that the work of the convicts is real work, which may fairly be considered satisfactory. I find that the value of the work performed by convicts at the three convict prisons, Portland, Portsmouth, and Chatham, was during last year £106,421, while the cost of maintaining those establishments was £110,532, so that the earnings of the convicts nearly equalled the whole expense to which the country was put. I may mention, also, that at Chatham, where there are great facilities for remunerative labour in making bricks for public works, there was an actual profit. In 1867—the last year for which Returns have been issued—the average daily number of convicts at Chatham was 990, and the value of their labour was £40,898 7s., while the cost of their maintenance and supervision was £35,315 18s., there being thus a surplus of £5,582 9s. Another change, which formed part of the Act of 1864, was the establishment of police supervision; and one of the principal objects of the present measure being to extend this, it is well that I should state the results of that supervision. A great evil which was apprehended from the close supervision of convicts, released on tickets of leave, was that the necessity of reporting themselves to the police and the constant surveillance of the police over them would prevent their obtaining an honest livelihood. So far, however, from that being the case, it has in many cases afforded great assistance in their earning an honest livelihood; nor am I surprised at it, for my opportunities of seeing the working of the system in Ireland convinced me that the supervision of the police might be carried out so as effectually to prevent the recurrence of crime, and at the same time be no hindrance, but a great assistance, to their obtaining employment. There is, however, no central registry or control, and no sufficient communication between the police authorities of different parts of the country; and it is obvious that, without a complete network of communication and a registry easily accessible to the authorities of all the different places where the convicts may be found, this supervision cannot be efficient. I am anxious, however, that the House should not suppose that in bringing forward this measure we are actuated by any feeling of panic or alarm. It would be a decided mistake to conclude that past legislation has been a complete failure, that crime has greatly increased, or that there is anything in our position more calculated to excite alarm in the public mind than at other times. I know the great danger of referring to statistics, for it is easy to pick out figures to prove some particular conclusion, and it may be aptly retorted that there are other figures leading to a different conclusion. While, however, aware of that danger, certain broad facts bearing on the question may be gathered. In 1865-6 the indictable offences known to the police numbered 50,549, and in 1866-7 they were 55,538, showing an increase of 4,989, or something under 10 per cent. That is not, perhaps, very satisfactory; but, looking back to a longer period, and taking—I am not able to find precisely analogous figures—the convictions, excluding summary ones, I find that from 1856 to 1862 the annual average was 13,859, while in 1867 the number was 14,207. I begin with 1856, because in the previous year the Criminal Jurisdiction Act was passed, which placed many classes of offences under the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and enabled a considerable number of crimes to be dealt with summarily. Now, although there is an apparent increase of crimes from 13,859 to 14,207, your Lordships must remember that in the interval the population increased by nearly 2,500,000, so that there is a decrease rather than an increase in proportion to the population. These facts show that crime has not in general largely increased. Then, again, the number of sentences to penal servitude was during the ten years ending 1857 2,374 a year, while in 1867 it had fallen to 1,772. Looking back, then, to see whether crime has increased or not, I think our system has been tolerably successful, and that on the whole there is no increase in the crime of this country. Why, if so, I may be asked, do we come forward to propose fresh legislation? There are two obvious reasons for this—one of a general nature, the other of a more special character. One reason is that we naturally obtain fresh experience from year to year as to the treatment of criminals—fresh opportunities of knowledge as to the best mode of dealing with criminals, fresh means of knowing how crime is committed, and how it may be prevented, and how to make punishment more effectual and deterrent; so that it is necessary from time to time to re-adjust our system and make it more complete. But there is at the present time a special reason for carefully scrutinizing and seeing whether we cannot improve our system, and that is the complete cessation of transportation; for though during the last few years we have not sent out to our colonies any very large number of convicts, it is obvious that for 500 convicts a year to remain in the country involves a considerable increase of the criminal population. Another reason for such an increase is that the operation of the Act of 1864, imposing longer sentences of penal servitude, is beginning to tell. I hold in my hand two interesting Returns, showing the present number of convicts under detention in England and Wales, and the probable number in future years. The convicts now under detention are 6,898 males, besides 552 at Gibraltar, making a total of 7,450, and 1,172 females. It is not likely there will be any increase in the number of female convicts, as the transportation of females has ceased for a long time. Confining the calculation, therefore, to males, the probable number on the 31st of March, 1869, will be 7,507; in 1870, 8,619; in 1871, 8,938; and in 1872, 9,146; the maximum estimated number in 1877 will be 10,666. The calculation, of course, assumes that the amount of crime will be constant. As to the convicts released on license or tickets of leave, the remission never exceeds one-fourth of the whole sentence, excluding the nine months passed in separate confinement, and the average length of remission is one year and seven months. The number of males now on license is 1,566, and of females, 441. In 1870 it will probably be 1,705, and about ten years hence it will probably be something under 3,000, if the proportion of crime remains the same. That, therefore, constitutes the number with which we shall have to deal at any one time. In dealing, however, with the criminal class, we must not confine our attention to those convicted of grievous offences and undergoing penal servitude. We must view the whole of what are usually called the criminal classes, and I regret to say that, large as may appear the number of convicts I have just stated, the number of the criminal classes is far larger. It is, in fact, a great army—an army making war on society, and it is necessary that society should for its own defence make war upon them. Here then are the numbers of the criminal classes taken from the latest Returns. The average of 1865-6, 1864-5, and 1863-4 show the following results:—Known thieves and depredators, 22,959; receivers of stolen goods, 3,095; prostitutes, 27,186; suspected persons, 29,468; vagrants and tramps, 32,938; making a total of 115,646. There was a decrease last year of 2·8 per cent on this average. In the metropolis alone there were in 1866-7 14,648 persons living by dishonest means, and 5,628 prostitutes; the numbers in 1865-6 being 14,491, and 5,554 prostitutes. Now, the question that presents itself is this—How are we to deal with this vast mass of criminals—with this great army of crime with which we have to contend? Various modes of repression have been suggested. Some think we ought to impose very stringent sentences—which to a certain extent was done by the Act of 1864, for it very properly made the minimum length of penal servitude five years, and in case of a previous conviction seven years. That was, no doubt, wise legislation, and the policy may justly, I think, be carried somewhat further. That Act, however, left untouched the discretion of the Judges to sentence criminals to imprisonment instead of penal servitude—the consequence being that a very considerable number of criminals do not come within the range of that system of discipline which has been judged best adapted to their reclamation. Some have gone so far—and I may mention among them the name of a gentleman well known to your Lordships, and whose pamphlet on the subject many of you may have read—Mr. Henry Taylor—as to suggest that all persons convicted of felony a second or third time—persons, in fact, who are habitual offenders—should be sentenced to imprisonment for life, and should actually be confined for life. I do not, however, think the public mind is prepared—at present at all events—for such a system. Independent of the great expense it would involve—to which it may be answered that the expense of their depredations is greater—I do not think the public are prepared for keeping such large numbers of persons permanently in confinement. Not only that, but I honestly think that neither the country nor the Government has yet mastered the problem how to deal with persons who are under sentence of imprisonment for life. I wish, moreover, here to state my opinion, though further legislation on this point is not necessary, that it is essential that men who have committed grievous crimes should expect their sentence to be fully carried out, and that persons who have been sentenced for grievous crime should never, except under very exceptional circumstances, have their sentences relaxed. When I was in Ireland the matter had been very strongly brought under my notice. In Ireland the transportation of criminals ceased fourteen or fifteen years ago, and consequently there is a larger accumulation of prisoners under life sentences than in this country; and my experience there showed me that there was this difficulty in imprisoning convicts for life—After a certain time they become unfitted by age or infirmity for public works, and there arises a great temptation to regard these men as having in some respect atoned for their serious crimes. Now, there are grave reasons why they should not be released. No doubt it often happened that a criminal who has committed a grievous but solitary crime may not be a thoroughly bad man, and so far as he is concerned he might, perhaps, be released without the fear of his committing a fresh injury on society. But then there is the deterrent effect which the certainty that the sentence would be fully carried out is calculated to have upon others. The practical question, then, arises—How are we to deal with such men? The mode, I think, has been indicated in the Report of a Committee or Commission; and it has always seemed to me the only one. Your Lordships are aware that there are a considerable number of men both in Ireland and in England who are undergoing sentences under the term of “criminal lunatics.” Many of these men, though out of their senses at the time of the commission of their crimes, and therefore rightly spared from the punishment of death, have become, through lapse of time and change of treatment, perfectly sane. Now there is no difficulty in keeping those persons under sentence of perpetual imprisonment, and it seems to me that a similar system could be applied to men who, having had a life sentence imposed on them, are no longer, on account of infirmity or other reasons, fit to be employed on public works, and might properly be put under such restraint only as is necessary to seclude them from the public eye. That might be combined with a certain amount of remission—for it is always well to hold out hope, even to the most grievous offender. Without it you cannot enforce salutary discipline, and you ought to hold out a hope not of remission, but that, consequent on good behaviour, they would be removed from public works to those prisons where they would be confined under restraints and conditions less irksome. That, I admit, is not entirely germane to the Bill, but it is relevant to the main subject, and of such importance that I desired to mention it. Now, if we reject the notion of placing all these habitual criminals under life sentences, upon what can we fall back? It seems to me that the legislation of 1864 and the system established under it suggest the alternative. I think that we should extend the range of the legislation then adopted—that is to say, that we should extend it to other classes of the criminal population; and I think we are perfectly justified in shifting the burden of proof in certain cases from the accuser to the accused. Nobody honours more than I do the good old maxim of English Law that a man shall be presumed innocent until he shall have been proved to be guilty; but there can be no harm—on the contrary, it seems to me perfectly consistent with justice to the individual himself and to be demanded by justice to society—that men who by repeated crimes have shown that they set the laws of society at defiance should be placed under a different code—that a special law should be made applicable to them—that, to a certain extent, they should be under a disability, and should have the burden of proving that they are earning a livelihood by honest means. A man who has committed several crimes, falling under the denomination of felony, may fairly be called upon to prove that he is living by honest means, and, if he cannot prove it, should be sentenced to imprisonment. He will have all the other guarantees of justice possessed by the innocent man—an open Court, a public hearing, and complete publicity, all of which are safeguards for a free and innocent man, not being oppressed or unjustly treated; but on the assumption that he has once been proved a criminal he will be put upon his proof that he is no longer so. These are the main principles which the Government propose to lay down, and I will now shortly explain the provisions of the Bill. The first part of it relates to men who are in the possession of tickets of leave. It is at present provided that such men, if brought before a magistrate, and if they fail to satisfy the magistrate that they are not earning an honest livelihood, they may be remitted to undergo their original term of imprisonment. Now, we propose that a man holding such a ticket may, at any time, be summoned by a police-constable before a magistrate and called upon to show that he is earning an honest livelihood, the burden of proof resting on him. If he cannot prove his honesty, he will be remitted to undergo his original sentence of penal servitude. Then, in order to make supervision more effectual, we propose a central registry of licenses, the Chief Commissioner of Police in the metropolis keeping a register of all licenses throughout the country. We propose, further, that officers shall be appointed by the Secretary of State to furnish all such particulars as may be required in order to establish a complete system of communication throughout the country, so as to form a complete network of supervision of criminals in every part of the country. This is obviously essential, for otherwise a man convicted in the metropolis may go to some part of the country where the authorities possess no information about him, so that there is no control over his conduct. It will also, no doubt, be convenient to carry out the plan of photographing convicts, which has been advocated by my noble Friend Lord Carnarvon, and which I believe has been partially carried out and has been found a very effective protection. In this part of the Bill the existing system in relation to criminals holding licenses is strengthened, but is not considerably changed. The next part of the Bill relates to that large class of criminals who are sentenced not to penal servitude but to imprisonment. We do not propose to take away the discretion the Judges now possess; but what is proposed is that whenever a man is a second time convicted of felony, if on his second conviction he does not receive sentence of penal servitude, it shall be part of his sentence that, for seven years, he shall remain under the supervision of the police over and above his term of imprisonment. We propose that a police-constable may at any time, during those seven years, without warrant, bring such a man before a magistrate, and call upon him to show that he is getting a livelihood honestly. We do not make the plan so severe as in the other case, but we propose that the magistrate shall satisfy himself that the convict is not obtaining an honest livelihood, and in that case shall have power to sentence him to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year. We also propose that if a police-constable shall find such a person in any public place, such as is defined in the Vagrant Act, in such circumstances as to make it probable that he is about to commit or aid in committing a felony, he may likewise be brought before a magistrate, and, if the circumstances render his dishonest purpose probable, shall be imprisoned for not more than a year. We further propose that if any person under police supervision, shall be found in a private dwelling-house, or in those appurtenances of a private dwelling-house well known to the law, then also he may be brought before a magistrate and, on the case being proved, sentenced to a like imprisonment. He will be under this supervision for seven years beyond the term of his imprisonment, and will be subject to imprisonment in any of the cases I have mentioned. The next portion of the Act refers to a man convicted of felony for the third time—I think that when a man has been so convicted for the third time, he falls so entirely under the category of habitual offenders that it is but right to take away the Judge's discretion of imposing imprisonment, and to insist that in all cases such an offender shall be sentenced to not less than seven years' penal servitude. This, however, is subject to the proviso that one of the convictions shall have been within five years; for it would be hard on a man who may have been honest for a considerable period, but has at last relapsed, that his old crime should be brought back with such severity as to subject him to so severe a sentence without any option. This class of offenders, if sentenced to seven years' penal servitude, will be subject for the remainder of his life to the conditions imposed on the previous class. We do not propose to compel him to show that he is earning an honest livelihood, but we think it will be sufficient—he having been seven years under supervision—if he is placed in the position of a rogue and vagabond. If found at any time during his life in circumstances indicative of an intention to commit a felony, he will accordingly be subject to a year's imprisonment. Such men lead a continual life of crime, looking upon it as a profession, and on imprisonment as one of the chances of war which it is possible to avoid. It is necessary, therefore, to place them under permanent supervision. This completes the alterations we propose as regards criminals sentenced for felony. But there is a special class deserving of attention as much, or perhaps, more than others—the receivers of stolen goods. But for them the criminal would have no means of disposing of his plunder, and in proportion as we lessen the facility of doing that we shall diminish crime. At present it is necessary, in order to punish a receiver, to prove that he has received goods knowing them to be stolen; but we propose that where any man has been sentenced to imprisonment, if afterwards accused of being a receiver of stolen goods, the burden of proof shall be put upon him to show that he did not know the goods were stolen. We shall treat him as a suspected man, and we hope by that means to bring within the net of the law a great part of a class who are—I was almost about to say—more guilty than their miserable dupes and accomplices. There remains another and a very large class—vagrants, or, as they are more properly styled, rogues and vagabonds. This class has hitherto escaped being regarded in the eye of the law as criminal. We propose to strengthen the law in this respect. Though not, like convicted criminals, within the definition of suspected persons, they are at present under the Vagrant Act, and if found in a dwelling-house or public place, under circumstances indicating an intention of committing an unlawful act, they may be summarily sentenced to imprisonment. It is necessary, however, to prove some overt act. With this proviso we propose to dispense—so that if there is sufficient evidence to convince a magistrate that the vagrant was there with an unlawful purpose he will come under the provisions of the Vagrant Act. In some parts of the country where, perhaps, the magistrates have not been well acquainted with the subtleties of the law, rogues and vagabonds have been swept away by not paying attention to the condition of an overt act. That, however, is not at present legal, but, as it has been found effective, we propose that henceforth no overt act shall be necessary. There are other provisions of minor importance; one of them relates to pawnbrokers, who frequently give great facilities for the disposal of stolen goods, and to whom we propose to extend certain provisions of an Act passed a few years ago for Scotland, but with which I need not trouble your Lordships. One other change will, we think, be generally approved. All who have studied police reports must have remarked the frequency of brutal assaults on police-constables, and I think your Lordships will all be of opinion that the police, who are the guardians of the law, and who execute their duties, I must say, with a courage which does them the highest credit, should be well protected by the law. At present, in the metropolis—for what reason I am at a loss to conceive, for police constables are as much exposed to assaults there as elsewhere—the punishment for such assaults is only one month's imprisonment, while in the rest of the country it may amount to two. We propose that in all cases a magistrate may impose imprisonment not exceeding six months. I have now put before the House the general principles on which we propose to legislate, and have explained the main provisions of the Bill. We do not assert that on examination its details may not be found capable of improvement, but I believe it is based on sound principles—principles of justice and of due protection to society, and I have a confident expectation that, if passed into law, as I trust it will be, without material alteration, while it will not diminish in any degree the liberties of free and innocent men, it will materially strengthen that security for life and property which it must be the paramount object of every civilized Government to maintain.

Bill for the more effectual prevention of Crime, presented, by the Lord Privy Seal.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: Of the many valuable provisions of the Bill I think none will be more effective in the repression of crime than that which refers to the receivers of stolen goods. I am persuaded that if it be possible to reduce the number of these men by throwing greater difficulties in the way of their carrying on their trade, and by punishing more severely those who are detected, you will do more to repress crime than in any other way. Even at present the great difficulty of a burglar or housebreaker is in getting rid of large quantities of valuable property; for if he has stolen a quantity of plate he is afraid to take it to his own or a friend's house lest he should be detected. His great object, accordingly, is to have it converted as soon as possible into a different form; and the consequence is that crucibles and smelting-pots are going on all day and all night in this great city. I believe that in a very large number of cases the whole of the plate is reduced within two or three hours of the robbery, or even less, to ingots of silver. As for spoons, forks, and jewellery, they are not taken so readily to the smelting-pot; but to well-known places, where there is a pipe, similar to that which your Lordships may have seen—I hope none may have seen it of necessity—in a pawnbroker's shop. I have had a description of the process from practitioners. The thief taps, the pipe is lifted up, and in the course of a minute a hand comes out covered with a glove, takes up the jewellery, and gives out the money for it. But, my Lords, I am sorry to say that the reception of stolen goods is carried on not by a low class only. I regret to say that there are tradesmen of high standing in this town who follow the practice. Your Lordships may have read in the newspapers recently a case of the robbery of a very valuable necklace. It appeared on the hearing of the case that the necklace in question, which was one with stones and very rich setting, had been carried to a jeweller, who instantly broke it up. On being asked for an explanation, he said,

“ We make it a rule never to ask questions, and for our convenience we break up such articles as soon as possible.” I have no doubt that persons who are in the habit of buying such articles without asking questions do find it for their convenience to break them up as soon as possible. Once the stones are taken out of articles of jewellery and the setting is broken up, almost every possibility of detection is at an end. This being so, I would not, in the case of the receivers of stolen property, stand on the minutiae of strict evidence. I would put the onus of proof on persons well known to the police as receivers of stolen property to show that property found in their possession had been obtained by them rightly and honestly. I am inclined to think that, by such provisions as have been indicated by my noble Friend, a very great and very beneficial effect will be produced. I would just ask my noble Friend whether it is intended that persons, placed under supervision for seven years, shall be at liberty during that time to change their residence or quit the district in which they have been living. I think, my Lords, that when all the facts are before us we shall be able to come to a more consolatory conclusion than has been come to by my noble Friend. Though undoubtedly there are many thousands of persons living by surreptitious means—by robberies and larcenies—I am convinced that a very great number of those criminals are open to efforts for their reformation, and that the professional thieves and burglars—the criminals who take up robbery and burglary as a profession—are not a twentieth of the number alluded to by my noble Friend. I repeat, my Lords, that I think such amendments in the law as the noble Earl has indicated will do very great good, especially in the case of the receivers of stolen property.

LORD HOUGHTON: My Lords, I think it would be very desirable that, when we come to discuss this Bill in a future stage, we should have more exact details of the working of the Act of 1864 than those which have been stated by my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal. I opposed the passing of that Act, and I am now of opinion that it would be very important for your Lordships to have something more than the assurance of my noble Friend that it has worked well. I should like that before your Lordships come to the same conclusion on the point as my noble Friend, we should be satisfied that the Act of 1864 has not had the effect of preventing ticket of leave men from obtaining employment, and from their being absorbed in the general population.

EARL GREY: My Lords, the suggestion of my noble Friend (Lord Houghton) deserves consideration. I hope that during the progress of this measure we shall have the fullest information possible as to the working of the existing law; and I venture to suggest that, in order to make that information clear and satisfactory, the proper course would be to refer this Bill to a Select Committee. On this subject of the Criminal Law we have already had more than one inquiry in this and the other House of Parliament, and I think great benefits have resulted from those inquiries. I think, therefore, that when so large an alteration as this is proposed, and considering the early period of the Session, it is highly desirable that the measure just sketched out should be brought carefully under the consideration of a Select Committee. I am certain that course would not throw any difficulty in the way of legislation, but would make our legislation more satisfactory to ourselves and to the public, and I hope, also, more complete. Having made that remark, I may observe further that, from the sketch of the proposed measure given us by my noble Friend, it appears to me that the Bill proceeds on right principles, and will do something to retrieve the error committed by Parliament in 1864, when professing to act on the Report of the Committee of the previous year. The only sentence in the speech of my noble Friend which I heard with regret was that in which I understood him to say that Sir Joshua Jebb—who, I believe, was one of the ablest and best public servants of his time—in the later period of his official life had not succeeded in maintaining the discipline of the Convict establishment as efficiently as it ought to have been conducted. I think it is only due to Sir Joshua Jebb to say that, having paid great attention to the evidence brought before the Penal Servitude Commission in 1863, I believe that any failure there was in maintaining the discipline of the Convict establishment and making the punishment as formidable to offenders as it ought to be was not owing to any fault of Sir Joshua, but principally to the fault of Parliament itself. A sentimental feeling in favour of prisoners had prevailed in the public mind for some time before, and Parliament and the Government, acting under the pressure of that sickly feeling, had unduly restricted the length of sentences passed upon criminals and had established regulations which did not enable Sir Joshua Jebb to carry out the system of punishment with that strictness and determination which, if he had had the power, I believe he would have been only too glad to employ. I am firmly persuaded that in dealing with the criminal classes real mercy to them, as well as justice to society, requires that there should be no shrinking from a course of stern determination.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I am not on this occasion going to make any observations on the Bill which the noble Earl (the Lord Privy Seal) is about to lay upon the table, and which is not yet before us. As far as I can judge from his statement, the Bill seems to be a salutary one, and one which will recommend itself to those who hold salutary ideas on this subject. I want to say a word on the proposition of my noble Friend who has just sat down, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. It may, perhaps, become advisable to refer the merely mechanical details of the measure to a Select Committee; but I earnestly hope the principles of the Bill will be examined and settled by a Committee of the Whole House, and not delegated to a Select Committee. I think it would be damaging to the character of the House to withdraw from the responsibility of publicity the opinions of those who influence the decisions of the House on questions of such magnitude. I submit that, if the Bill is sent upstairs, the duty of the Select Committee should be carefully confined to the details, and that the wider matter of principle should be decided upon by the wider discretion of the House itself.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, like my noble Friend who has just sat down, I rise, not to make any observations as to the details of the Bill, but to say a word as to the further progress of the measure. A proposition has been made that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and that the Select Committee should inquire into the working of the Act of 1864—a process which, if the inquiry is to be a careful one, would involve the taking of evidence. Now, the Bill of the Government is one founded on certain distinct principles, and I apprehend it will be your Lordships' duty, on the second reading, to consider and decide whether those principles can be safely adopted in the legislation of this country. From what we have heard from the noble Earl I think there is something very wholesome in the principles laid down in the Bill; but I apprehend that on the second reading it will be for your Lordships to pronounce an opinion as to whether those principles are worthy your acceptance or not. If your Lordships should pass the second reading and then delegate the subject to a Select Committee to take evidence as to the principle on which you should legislate, that would be tantamount to shelving the Bill for this Session. I hope that when the Bill is before us your Lordships may find it is one the principle of which ought to meet with the approbation of your Lordships' House. If it should, it may be useful to have the Bill go to a Select Committee, not that the Select Committee may take evidence, but that they may consider the details and the working of the Bill; though, even with respect to such points, I think the subject of our criminal law is so interesting that the details of a Bill like this might well be settled in a Committee of the Whole House. At all events, I must express my hope that the Government will not refer this Bill to a Select Committee for the purpose of having evidence taken.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he thought the Bill might be advantageously referred to a Select Committee, whose labours he thought would greatly assist the House in their subsequent legislation.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD asked the noble Earl who introduced the Bill, whether he could give him any information as to the number of persons likely to come under the supervision of the police, after a second conviction, under the provisions of the Bill? He held a strong opinion that police supervision, as at present exercised, was utterly inefficient. He gathered from the noble Earl's statement that no discretion was to be left to the Judges or to the committing magistrates as to whether they would give a seven years' sentence of police supervision or not, as such a sentence was to follow as a matter of course upon a second conviction.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he could not give an answer to the noble Earl's question at the present moment, but he would take care to put himself in a position to answer it on a future day. He might point out, however, that the provisions of the Bill did not relate solely to police supervision, but also rendered criminals, after a second conviction, subject to certain specified regulations, by which persons other than the police would be enabled to bring them before a magistrate for examination. He was greatly obliged to the House for the attention with which they had listened to his explanation of the provisions of the Bill, and he must express his entire concurrence with the view of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns), that the proper time for the consideration of the principles of the Bill was upon the second reading. He also agreed with the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) in deprecating the practice of the House, which obtained too much, of sending Bills of importance before a Select Committee upstairs. The result of such a course—as he had been often told—was that the proceedings of their Lordships, however just and right they might be, failed to obtain that credit to which they were entitled, or to attract adequate public attention. After what had passed that evening, he thought it would be better to postpone further discussion upon the Bill until the second reading, when their Lordships would have had an opportunity of examining the provisions of the Bill for themselves, and when the Government would be in a position to determine what course it would be proper for them to adopt with regard to the measure.

Bill read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Friday next. (No. 18.)

LORD NAPIER'S ANNUITY BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to enable Lord Napier of Magdala to receive the full benefit of the salary of Member of Council for the Presidency of Bombay, notwithstanding his being in receipt of an annuity granted to him under the Act 31st and 32d Vict. cap. 31—Was presented by The Duke of ARGYLL; read 1^a. (No. 15.)

GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to define the powers of the Governor General of India in Council at meetings for making laws and regulations, and to make better provision for making laws and regulations for certain parts of India; and for certain other purposes—Was presented by The Duke of ARGYLL; read 1^a. (No. 16.)

FINE ARTS COPYRIGHT CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for consolidating and amending the Law of Copyright in works of Fine Art—Was presented by The Lord WESTBURY; read 1^a. (No. 17.)

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN SHEEP.

QUESTION.

MR. CARNEGIE asked, Whether it was true, as stated in one or two of the public journals of the preceding day, that some sheep recently imported from Antwerp had been found suffering from sheep-pox?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had caused inquiries to be made on the subject, and it would be satisfactory for hon. Members to know that the fact was as follows:—On Wednesday, a cargo of sheep had been landed at the Victoria Dock from Antwerp, which had been marked by the inspector for a second examination; but, upon giving that full examination, they had been passed as entirely free from disease.

ARMY—THE NEW ZEALAND WAR MEDAL.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, When the Medal promised by the late Secretary of State for War on the 6th of last July to the Naval and Military Forces engaged in the late Campaigns in New Zealand is likely to be issued?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, that the medal promised to the forces engaged in the late campaigns in New Zealand would be ready shortly, and the Estimates presented on the preceding day included a sum for them.

SPECIAL AND COMMON JURIES.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Government intend, during the present Session, to introduce any measure founded upon the Report and Recommendations of the Select Committee on Special and Common Juries made in the last Session of Parliament?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill, which he hoped shortly to lay before the House, embodying several of the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session.

IRELAND—LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT.—QUESTIONS.

MR. DOWNING said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Ministry to introduce a Bill for the amendment of the Law of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland during the present Session of Parliament; and, if not, what are the intentions of the Ministry with regard to legislation on the subject?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, on this subject he must refer the hon. Member to what was said by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury on the first night of the Session, when he volunteered the statement before a Question had been asked, that nothing but physical impossibility, or in other words, want of time in the present Session, had deterred the Government from dealing with this great question; and it was that, and that alone, which prevented them taking any action upon it.

MR. BLAKE said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Irish Members were to understand, from the Answer just given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that Her Majesty's Government would not introduce a measure during the present Session to amend the law relating to the tenure and improvement of land in Ireland; and, in the event of Government being only prevented from attempting to legislate on the question owing to its being physically impossible, as stated by the Chief Secretary, whether a statement would be made as to the principles on which the Government would propose to legislate on the question hereafter?

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman has asked me two Questions—first, whether Her Majesty's Government have abandoned all hope or intention of bringing in a Bill on the subject of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland during the present Session; and next, whether, if they do not, they will make some declaration of principle on which they would proceed to legislate. In answer to the first of these Questions, I should say, following up what has been stated by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that we do not see the smallest possibility of there being any such state of circumstances in the present Session as would enable us to introduce a Bill on this important subject with the due consideration which its real importance demands. With regard to the second Question, I think it would not be expected that Her Majesty's Government should endeavour to state their policy—and it would be extremely difficult to make intelligible any such statement, unless it was accompanied by all those details and particulars which could only be presented in the former case.

SLAVE TRADE—BRAZILIAN VESSELS. QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the circumstances which led to the passing of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 122, for the suppression of the African Slave Trade in Brazilian vessels, have not ceased to exist; and whether it is the intention of Government to take measures for the repeal of the said Act, with a view to rendering more intimate our relations with the Brazilian Empire?

MR. GLADSTONE said, in reply, that it was the intention of the Government to take measures for the repeal of the Act in question, commonly known as the "Aberdeen Act;" and he believed that his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) had on the preceding evening introduced a Bill into the House of Lords for that purpose.

ARMY—MILITARY APPOINTMENTS. QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, from the "Letter of Service" appointing His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief, such appointment appears to have been made for life or for a lesser period; whether the Secretary of State for War may recommend to Her Majesty persons for Commissions, either directly or by purchase; whether it is consistent with military discipline and the regulations of the Service to appeal from a decision of the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief, or of the Military Secretary, to the Secretary of State for War; whether all high military appointments are first submitted to the Secretary of State for War for his approval; and, further to ask, whether, regarding both efficiency and economy, it is the intention of the Government to inquire into the expediency of concentrating the duties of the War Office and Horse Guards in one Office, under the exclusive control of a Minister responsible to Parliament?

MR. CARDWELL: The "Letter of Service" appointing His Royal Highness the Field-Marshal-Commanding-in-Chief conveys the appointment, not for any specified time, but during Her Majesty's pleasure. The Secretary of State does not recommend to Her Majesty persons for commissions, either directly or by purchase. Commissions in the Artillery and Engineers are given entirely by open competition; the commissions without purchase in the Line are given either by open competition at Sandhurst or by selection to deserving non-commissioned officers; and commissions by purchase are given by qualifying examination. Perhaps I may be permitted to add that in my opinion it would be very unfortunate if patronage connected with the Army were transferred from the General-Commanding-in-Chief to a political Officer. It is not consistent with military discipline and the regulations of the Office to appeal from a decision of the Field-Marshal-Commanding-in-Chief to the Secretary of State for War, and that is perfectly consistent with the fact that reference is constantly made to the Secretary of State in cases of special importance and difficulty; and further, that, if at any time the discipline of the Army were to fall into an unsatisfactory state, the Secretary of State for War would not be exonerated from responsibility if he omitted to take measures to prevent the continuance of that state of things. There are not, so far as I know, any decisions of the Military Secretary; his duty is to convey the decisions of His Royal Highness the Field-Marshal-Commanding-in-Chief. All high military appointments are first submitted to the Secretary of State for War for his approval. There is no need for an inquiry whether it is expedient to concentrate the duties of the War Office and Horse Guards in one office, because Her Majesty's Government, and I believe the House, are perfectly satisfied, without inquiry, that it would be very expedient to concentrate them in one office, and that expediency is wholly irrespective of any changes in the functions properly belonging to the two Offices.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

THE PATENT LAWS.—QUESTION.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether it be the intention of the Government to introduce during the present Session any measure for the amendment of the Patent Laws; and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to embody in the Bill the "Recommendations" of the Royal Commission (dated July 29, 1864) appointed to inquire into the working of the Law relating to Letters Patent for Inventions?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, there were so many important questions to be dealt with that he was not able to hold out any confident expectation that the Government would be able to deal with the question of the Patent Laws this Session.

EXEMPTIONS FROM POOR RATES. QUESTION.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any step, during the present Session, fully to exempt Public Hospitals, Infirmarys, Dispensaries for the Sick, and endowed Almshouses from liability to rating to the Relief of the Poor?

MR. GOSCHEN replied that that was a very large Question—a much larger one, indeed, than it appeared to be as put by the hon. Member. It would be very difficult to confine any such exemptions to public hospitals, infirmaries, dispensaries for the sick, and endowed almshouses. The Sunday schools, for instance, had been omitted from the list; and again, there was the question of endowed schools. If they were to exempt endowed almshouses the question would arise whether endowed schools should not be admitted to a similar privilege. Then they came to the public buildings, municipal buildings, and county buildings. The question was, in fact, an exceedingly large and complicated one and it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps in the matter this Session.

REPRESENTATION OF IRELAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. RAIKES, in rising to call attention to the present system of Irish Representation and to put Questions to Her Majesty's Government thereon, said, he was conscious that the House must feel as fully as he did the desirability of such a question as this being taken up by abler and more experienced hands than his, but as no Member better qualified seemed disposed to deal with it he hoped the House would not refuse him the kind indulgence which it usually accorded to those who addressed it for the first time. In the first place, it would be necessary for him to review some of the principal incidents of the Reform legislation of the last few years, but he hoped to do so without any superfluous reference to those controversies which took place at the time. It would be in the recollection of the House that in the course of last Session the Government introduced Reform Bills for Ireland and Scotland; and that, whilst that for Scotland had the good fortune to emerge from the Legislature a complete and perfect measure, such a fate did not befall that for Ireland, for at a very early period of its career those most important clauses which had reference to the re-distribution of seats were withdrawn, and only those relating to the franchise became law, the Government believing that it would be impossible for them to carry at that time any measure on which any serious difference of opinion existed. He would ask the House to go back a little earlier in the history of Reform. In 1866, a measure was introduced by the Government of Lord Russell, which contemplated treating the question of Reform in two separate parts, and a Franchise Bill was introduced without having any reference to the re-distribution of seats, but that course did not obtain general approval; and his noble Friend the Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor) proposed an Amendment by which he sought to obtain from the House a declaration that it was desirable that the question of the franchise and that of the re-distribution of seats should go together. Her Majesty's Government, after some resistance, assented to that principle, and brought in a measure for the re-distribution of seats for England and Wales, even though they were compelled to do so without that mature deliberation and careful inquiry which they might have wished to bestow on the subject. Since then it had been generally recognized by both sides of the House that the question of Reform ought to be treated as a whole, and that the franchise and re-distribution of seats should be dealt with in one measure. That policy had been pursued with regard to England and Scotland, but not with regard to Ireland. One of the principal objections offered to such a course as that of separating the two measures from each other was the possibility that a dissolution might possibly intervene between the passing of the Franchise Bill and the introduction of a measure for the re-distribution of seats. Now that was precisely what had occurred with regard to Ireland—and at what a crisis in her history. That Her Majesty should be advised to dissolve Parliament and appeal to a constituency but half reformed, a mere apology for an electoral body, and rather the ghost of the old constituency than the germ of the new, had been hitherto regarded as little short of a mockery of representative institutions. Yet that was precisely what had occurred in dealing with Ireland; nor did the anomalous state of her representation end there. By the Acts of 1866-7 England had one representative for every 41,000 of population, Wales had one for every 38,000, and Scotland one for every 52,000, or thereabouts. Ireland had one for every 56,000, and although that state of things might be viewed with calmness by those who always expected Ireland to occupy an inferior position, he doubted whether the House would be content to allow her to be worse treated in this matter than the sister kingdoms. The anomaly was even more striking if the representation of the counties alone was compared. The English counties had one Member to every 58,000 of population, the Welsh one to every 49,000, the Scotch one to every 56,000, but Ireland one only to every 78,194. Considering so much had been said about Reform, he was somewhat surprised that not even professed grievance-mongers had discovered and published this very gross electoral anomaly. He would put it in another way. The 5,000,000 of Ireland had, through their counties, sixty-four Members in Parliament; if those 5,000,000 had the good fortune to be situated between the Thames and the Tweed they would have eighty-six Members; if their lot had fallen in the still more fortunate country north of the Tweed they would have ninety, and if they had occupied that political paradise, the district lying between the Severn and Cardigan Bay they would have 102—only one less than the Members returned by all the boroughs and counties of Ireland. Again, if the representation of the English and Scotch counties had been framed on the estimate for Ireland, the House would number some fifty or sixty less than at present. It was resolved in the course of the Reform discussion to increase the representation of English counties exceeding 300,000 in population from four Members to six. Exclusive of the two large counties of Lancashire and Yorkshire, no less than ten English counties obtained this measure of justice, and there were fifteen counties in England containing a population between 150,000 and 300,000, which returned at the present time no less than four Members. Now, the population of the great county of Cork was, exclusive of boroughs, 419,000, and yet that great county returned only two Members to the British Parliament. The counties of Antrim, Down, Mayo, Galway, Donegal, Tyrone, and Tipperary, each of them containing between 200,000 and 300,000 inhabitants, and each of which, if situated on this side of St. George's Channel, would return four Members, only returned two. There were at least a dozen more—he would not weary the House with their names—which, if situated in England, would be placed on the same footing as Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Berkshire, and Hertfordshire. He confessed, in days when they heard so much about the great things they were going to do for Ireland, it appeared singular that no one should have taken up this question. If the mantle of O'Connell, who had always been alive to national rather than to party grievances, had descended on any Irish Member, this subject would have been brought forward before, and they would have obtained a far more just and satisfactory measure for Ireland than they had done. It might be supposed that he had taken up something of a forlorn hope in pressing this subject on a Ministry who had shown themselves so indifferent as not to think it worthy of a place in the Speech from the Throne. But there were two circumstances on which he built his hopes. The first was that there was among Her Majesty's present advisers one who had promised to drag his Colleagues to the bar of public opinion whenever he found them wanting in their duty to the public. Well, he would call upon that right hon. Gentleman now to perform that patriotic though somewhat painful operation in a case which must move his sympathies so strongly. In common with those who had watched that right hon. Gentleman's career he knew his implacable animosity to little boroughs, and his sympathies with large populations that were not fairly represented. He did not see why the Irish counties should not have the same sympathy from the right hon. Gentleman, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman might yet find an opportunity for one of those confidential communications—which some said were more frequently tendered than accepted—recommending this act of justice to the Irish people. The other ground on which he relied was that this Parliament had been specially elected and the Ministry had come into power on the simple, broad, and equitable platform of justice to Ireland. This was no sentimental grievance. In a very few days they would be all engaged in a wild-goose chase, they would be pursuing every ignis fatuus that a disordered fancy could conjure up. Before setting out on that Quixotic enterprise he hoped they would receive a promise that a real grievance such as that he had set forth would receive due attention from Her Majesty's Government. They were told that the Irish people were dissatisfied, and that they distrusted the good intentions of the British Parliament. Why should they not distrust a Parliament in which they had only a mockery of representation? He was not at present going to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland or the House to entertain a question that might lead to a distribution of seats throughout England and Scotland as well as Ireland. The remedy was close at hand. He had said that the electoral unit in the Irish counties was 78,000, in the Irish boroughs 21,000, and taking this basis of population as their guide they found that the Irish boroughs were as much favoured as the counties were injured. The boroughs in Ireland might be fairly divided into three classes. First, there were four great cities—Dublin, Belfast, Cork, and Limerick—which counted for a population of 500,000 out of 800,000 who inhabited Parliamentary boroughs. Next to them in importance was another set of boroughs, the most populous of which was Waterford, and the least populous Lisburn, and which contained about 224,000 inhabitants. They returned eighteen Members. Below that limit were thirteen boroughs, containing about 72,000 inhabitants, and returning thirteen Members, their average population being 5,529, while, as he had said, the average population to each Member in the great counties was 78,194. Was a state of things of that kind to be allowed to continue? They had now got in the House a Ministry which could command a great majority, and who could employ their majority to do that which a weak Ministry could not attempt. He would ask them to sweep from the face of the earth these thirteen little boroughs, and to give their Members to the great populous counties which he had named, and even when they had done that they would find that, in the counties, the average population represented by one Member would be 64,000, while in the boroughs it would be 25,000 or 26,000; so that the boroughs of Ireland would be nearly three times as well represented as the counties, instead of four times, as they were now. From the thirteen seats thus obtained they might give two to Cork county—he did not see why it should not return six Members—two additional to Antrim and Down, and one additional Member to each of the counties he had before enumerated. Suppose such a course was taken he should be probably told it would do no good. There were two bugbears to Members of that House. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would say there was no use in giving more Members to Irish counties because they would in that case give more power to the landlord. Thus, the Irish landlord was the bugbear of hon. Members opposite. On the other hand, hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side would be inclined to say—"You are giving too much power to the priests." Thus, the priest was a bug-bear to hon. Members on that side. But when they were doing an act of simple justice they ought not to look to results. If they owed a man £50, they should not inquire before paying it how he meant to spend it. If they adopted the plan which he had recommended, they might find an opportunity of giving a representative to the minority in each county, and thus diminish the bitterness to which election contests in Ireland gave rise. They would tranquillize the enmities, and at the same time recognize the just aspirations of the Irish people to have a fit representation. He would say, in conclusion, that they were invited at the present time to pay particular attention to the mote which might be observed in the eye of the Bishops and clergy of Ireland. Where, he would ask, was the beam which had obscured the vision of our English Reformers? Their conscience was so tender that they strained at the gnat of the Church Establishment in Ireland, and yet they expected the Irish people to swallow such a camel as to be represented in that House by persons—excellent and worthy persons no doubt—but sent to Parliament by constituencies unworthy of the name of towns. He wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce, during the present Session, a measure for the Redistribution of Seats in Ireland, and, if so, when; and further, whether it is not, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, somewhat premature to enter upon legislation materially affecting the welfare of Ireland before such a measure has been considered?

MR. M'MAHON said, that what the hon. Gentleman wished was to have the Irish people represented through counties; but as the representative of one of the small boroughs which the hon. Gentleman wished to abolish (New Ross), he must deny that the proposal would afford any satisfaction. What the Irish people themselves complained of was that the counties had a far larger representation than the counties in England, and very much larger than the boroughs. What the Irish people wanted was to be put in the same position as the people of England—that the counties should not have a larger proportion, and that the boroughs should have the same proportion of representatives as the boroughs of England. That Irish matters were brought before the House so often was all owing to the undue predominance of the landlord interest in Ireland. There were 105 Members returned from Ireland; two by the University of Dublin, sixty-four by the counties, and thirty-nine by the boroughs. Substantially there were sixty-six county Members to thirty-nine borough Members in Ireland. But in England, how stood the proportion? Up to the passing of the last Reform Act there were about three borough Members to one county Member. It was true some alteration was made by the late Act. In England, under the present law, the boroughs had 112 more Members than the counties; but the hon. Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor) wanted to increase the representation of the Irish counties. Formerly there were 236 borough and sixty-four county members in Ireland; but at the Union, while the counties kept all their representatives, 200 borough seats were abolished. When the Irish Church was abolished he hoped the Government would bring in a Reform Bill for Ireland; and he hoped they would do so next year, or even, perhaps, towards the end of the present Session, if no needless opposition were offered to the passing of their measures relating to the Established Church. But what the people of Ireland desired in the matter of Parliamentary Reform was that their representation should be put upon exactly the same footing as that of England, and that the proportion of seats now given respectively to the counties and boroughs of Ireland should be reversed.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes), in his zeal for the interests of Ireland and his kind intentions towards her people, had devoted a considerable part of his speech to advocating the claims of that country as a whole to a largely increased number of representatives. But, as he proceeded, he was good enough to withdraw that proposal from their present consideration, and did not ask them to involve themselves in a debate which he knew well would be one of no little difficulty and no small dimensions, if the question of a general re-distribution of seats were to be once more re-opened as between the three kingdoms in the first Session of the Reformed Parliament. He, therefore, understood the hon. Gentleman to limit his Question to the subject which appeared on the Notice Paper—namely, the re-distribution of seats in Ireland. Well, the circumstances in which that part of the Bill of the late Government fell out of sight in the course of its progress were familiar to most of them, and had, he thought, been correctly stated by the hon. Gentleman. As to that he would only say he believed the re-distribution clauses of that Bill were dropped by a sort of general consent on both sides, mainly for two reasons—first of all, because they were deemed by most of them extremely unsatisfactory, and certainly did not meet with favour from the Irish Members on that (the Ministerial) side, nor, he thought, with much favour from Irish Members on the other side. In the second place, the question of the re-distribution of seats in Ireland could not, after all, be one of very great magnitude. Important, indeed, as every such question was, still in the nature of things in the case of Ireland it must be confined within pretty narrow limits. It seemed to him that the greatest reform which could be made in the representation of Ireland would be one which he was afraid was not in the competence of that House, and that was the creation of a considerable number of large and important towns in that country. They might trust to her future progress in wealth, prosperity, and population to remedy that defect; but the truth was that if they were to have boroughs at all in Ireland, they must, for the most part, be boroughs of a small class. And when he heard the proposal of the hon. Member for Chester, made on the plea of justice to Ireland, he felt convinced that it would be met, as it had already been met by the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. M'Mahon), with very great disfavour. The hon. Gentleman's proposal was that there should be a very considerable transfer of seats from the boroughs to the counties of Ireland. Now, that was not a process which he was prepared to adopt. He did not believe that any considerable increase—he would not say none—of the county representation at the expense of the boroughs would be acceptable to the public opinion of Ireland, or would put the representation of that country on a proper footing. It was true there were in Ireland several important counties, large in size and numerous in population, with only two Members. But at the same time every county in Ireland possessed two Members, which was not the case in all parts of the United Kingdom; and, moreover, many of the Irish counties were small. Again, in the Irish counties there was a great degree of uniformity in the character of their population, which might be said to be divided almost entirely between landlords and tenants; whereas the population of the English and Scotch counties contained much more varied elements. Those facts afforded an additional reason to his mind why they should take care not, to any considerable extent, to impair or diminish the amount of the borough representation which Ireland now enjoyed, small as, he regretted to say, many of the boroughs were. But he was asked whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce in the present Session a measure for the redistribution of seats in Ireland. Well, that subject had not formed a part of the programme of Her Majesty's Government. He could not admit that it was a subject which urgently required to be dealt with, and he must say he thought that of all times the first Session of a New and Reformed Parliament was about the time least fitted for dealing with it. But events were happening at this moment which might possibly make some difference in the course to be taken on that matter, because, without prejudging what might occur, it was impossible to shut their eyes to the fact that proceedings were now going on before the Election Judges in Ireland which might impose on the House and the Government the necessity, in some limited degree, of considering that very question of the transfer of representation from one community to another. But the hon. Member for Chester asked another question on a point on which, however, he had not dealt at much length in his speech—namely, whether, in the opinion of the Government, it was not premature to enter upon legislation affecting the welfare of Ireland until they had carried a measure for the redistribution of seats? Now he had no hesitation in giving a positive answer to that part of the hon. Gentleman's inquiry. He was decidedly of opinion that it was by no means premature to introduce the measures of which the Government had given Notice; and that the defects, such as they were, which he did not deny to exist in the Irish system of representation, formed no reason whatever for any delay in carrying out that policy which Her Majesty's Government had announced. On the contrary, speaking with some knowledge of Ireland, he would venture to say to the hon. Member for Chester that while that policy had received the adhesion of a great majority of the Irish people, as expressed through their present representatives, the only effect of substituting for the present system of representation in Ireland one still more perfect and more capable of expressing the views of its people would, he believed, be largely to increase the support accorded to the policy announced by Her Majesty's Ministers.

TRADES UNIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SERJEANT COX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Report of the Trades Unions Commission is expected; and if it is the intention of the Government to introduce during the present Session any measure for the regulation of Trade Societies? He did not put that question from mere curiosity, but because it related to a real grievance. The Commission on Trades Unions, presided over by Sir William Erle, ex-Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, had sat for many months, and had had its martyrs, as the Benches on the other (the Ministerial) side of the House too painfully showed. It had been stated some time since in the public prints that the Report of the Commission might be shortly expected; and just when they were looking for that Report there appeared a little book, written and published by the learned President of the Commission, purporting to be the substance of a memorandum which he had presented to the Commission, giving an exposition of the law as it now stood affecting Trades Unions. That work was a very full, clear, and conclusive statement of the law bearing on that subject; and it was not surprising that, when the members of those societies, who were counted by tens of thousands, read that exposition, they were extremely anxious to know what verdict the Commission over which its distinguished author presided intended to pronounce on them. According to the declaration of the law by the ex-Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, it would seem that the very legality of these trades unions was questioned. It was, at least, difficult for them to know how to act without infringing the law. The unions were consequently placed in a very inconvenient position, and it was not surprising that, having had something in the nature of a judgment passed upon them before the verdict had been given, they should be extremely anxious to learn what that verdict would be. In the event of the legality of the unions being doubtful, he would ask the Government to introduce, without a moment's delay—within a week from the time when the Report of the Commission was laid upon the table—a Bill for the purpose of extricating them from the difficulty in which they would be involved; for, although there might be great difference of opinion as to the nature of the legislation in reference to trades unions, all would, he believed, agree that the existence of the unions must be recognized, although it might be necessary to surround their legal status by certain safeguards.

MR. BRUCE: As I stated to the House the other day, the Report of the Commission may be daily expected. I have had the advantage to-day of communicating with one of the Commissioners, and I have been told by him that the Report is on the point of being sent in. I believe, however, that, although the Report will soon be made public, some little time must elapse before the whole of the evidence is printed; but I have no doubt that it will be ready in time to be fully considered with a view to legislation during the present Session. When the Report has been submitted to the Government we shall lose no time in legislating on a question the importance of which, I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman, cannot be over-estimated.

PORTPATRICK LIGHTHOUSE.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD GARLIES, in rising to recall the attention of the President of the Board of Trade to the subject of Portpatrick Lighthouse, said, he must apologize to the House for taking up their time with a subject which would be uninteresting to them generally; but if he was enabled to make the few remarks which he hoped to do, he believed they would agree with him that he was only doing his duty in bringing forward the subject of which he had given Notice. He must preface his observations by thanking the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) for the very full amount of information he accorded him in answer to his Question on the subject a week ago; but he could not say that he was obliged to him for the substance of that information. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that it was the present intention of the Board of Trade to discontinue the light in question; but that, if it could be shown that the light was of utility to passing vessels, he would not sanction its abolition. Now, with the permission of the House, he would give a short resumé of the history of that Lighthouse. It was in the year 1790, some fourteen or fifteen years after that port had been first selected as the station for the transmission of mails from Great Britain to Ireland, that a lighthouse was first erected in the harbour. That continued until the year 1836; and in the interim the harbour was very much improved, and during that year (1836) the pier on the south side of that harbour was considerably elongated, and so important was the station considered that a new lighthouse was erected at the end of it. In that same year the charge of the Lighthouse was given to the Northern Lighthouse Commissioners, and they kept it burning until the year 1850, when, he imagined, it was discontinued in consequence of the mail service, which had been conducted by that port for seventy years consecutively, having been abandoned owing to there having been no railways at that time laid down to the ports on either side of the Channel. For two or three years, he must admit, that no accident happened on that part of the coast which could be considered to be mainly attributable to the want of that light; but in the year 1856—he thought it was—that a wreck occurred, entailing both loss of life and property: and it was on that account that the Board of Admiralty—in whose hands was at that time intrusted the charge of the harbour and works—ordered the resuscitation of the light, which had continued to be burnt ever since. Now, he had been engaged himself for the last few years with others in trying to re-establish a short sea communication between that port and the nearest port on the Irish coast; and it was during his interesting himself towards that end that he learnt from the persons who had practical knowledge in such matters, that that Portpatrick light was more beneficial than any other on the Scotch coast for all vessels from the English or Irish coast which were making for the entrance to the Clyde. Having given those facts, he would not trespass farther upon the time of the House; but he omitted to mention that a few days before the re-assembling of Parliament, he learned by a side wind that it was intended to extinguish that light by the first of March; and the answer he received from the right hon. Gentleman a week ago seemed rather to confirm that intention on the part of the Board of Trade. He must therefore speak, and with some confidence, to the right hon. Gentleman, who had hitherto, he believed, prided himself upon being outdone by no one in advocating the cause of humanity, not to signalize his advent to power by sanctioning the abandonment of a light, the maintenance of which he believed to be necessary to ensure the safety and preservation, not only of the property, but also of the lives of a large and deserving class of Her Majesty's subjects.

RULE OF THE ROAD AT SEA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade could only speak once on the Motion before the House, he would now interpose and ask the Question of which he had given Notice. He would, indeed, have been content with simply asking the Question, had he not thought it desirable to explain briefly the nature of the change which he should recommend as to "the rule of the road at sea"—the term usually applied to certain regulations issued by the Board of Trade for the purpose of showing vessels passing each other how to keep clear and avoid collision. Those rules had been translated into various foreign languages, and had been accepted as the rule of the road by almost all maritime nations. It would, therefore, undoubtedly be undesirable to meddle with those rules without sufficient cause. There were two rules with respect to steamships passing each other which, in his opinion, and in the opinion of many persons conversant with the subject, had occasioned collisions, and not secured safety at sea. The two rules to which he alluded were those contained in Articles 13 and 14 of the regulations. Article 13 was as follows:—

"Two ships under steam meeting.—If two ships under steam are meeting end-on or nearly end-on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other."

The 14th rule, which related to two ships under steam crossing, was—

"If two ships under steam are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other."

The rules, he thought, required no change so far as vessels meeting each other end-on were concerned, but when they were slightly or a great deal to the right of each other it was inexpedient that they should alter their course, so as to incur the risk of collision, which had occasionally occurred, from the desire that the vessels should pass to the left of each other. Instead of continuing on their course and passing each other on the right hand side, they turned their bows towards each other with a view to passing on the left, and many collisions and much loss of life had in consequence occurred. He was aware that the Board of Trade had issued certain explanations of the regulations, with the view to point out to those in charge of vessels that it was undesirable on such occasions as those to which he referred to pass to the left; but the Judges had asserted that those vessels which did not attempt to pass to the left under the circumstances and got into collision must be held to have broken the law. In the case of the Thames v. the Stork, the Court said—

"In order to excuse her from porting it must be quite clear that there are three points of difference and not less; for surely it would never do to contend, where they were so nearly meeting end-on, that if the evidence should be that it was one or two points only in the direction they were meeting, that that would be sufficient to dispense with the observance of this rule!"

In another case, the Fruiterer v. the Fingal, the Court said—

"Part of the evidence says that they were within two points of meeting end-on. I should consider that if they were within two points of meeting end-on, they would fall in with the latter part of the statement, 'nearly end-on.'"

There was, he might add, a valuable little handbook which was very generally accepted as a guide by officers in command of merchant ships, in which the author, Mr. Oliver, explained the law thus—

“The expression ‘keep out of the way’ used in the foregoing regulations has been held to mean, as a general rule, going astern of the other ship; but under some circumstances it is otherwise. In all cases of doubt the safer course is to port the helm.”

Now, if vessels happened to be at all to the right of each other it must be very unsafe to cross each other’s bows at the risk of collision, with a view to fulfil the letter of the law, if not its intention and spirit. He was confirmed in that opinion by a statement of a late Colleague of his, Sir Alexander Milne, who said—

“I have always thought that in the regulations some recognition of the starboard helm should have been made; but starboard helm is not mentioned, and persons are therefore led to assume that the starboard helm must not be used, whereas it is quite clear that when a green light is seen on the starboard bow, or nearly ahead, the starboard helm should be used.”

He thought he had sufficiently indicated the reasons why it was undesirable that vessels already to the right of each other should cross each other’s bows and pass to the left, and a very simple rule substituted for Rules 13 and 14 would, he believed, meet the difficulty. The rule which he would propose would require that steamers nearing each other should starboard the helm to a ship on the starboard bow or side, and port the helm to a ship on the port bow or side. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would see the expediency of adopting that view.

ADMIRAL SEYMOUR said, he was of opinion that, although no regulations could altogether avert collisions at sea, they yet might be, to a great extent, avoided by the establishment of proper rules. He entirely concurred with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) as to the propriety of the change which he suggested. There was another matter connected with the subject, on which, in his opinion, sufficient stress was not laid in the regulations, and that was the stopping of the engines. In the collision between the Osprey and the Amazon, which had recently occurred, it appeared that the Osprey had gone down with her engines at full speed.

MR. BRIGHT: The noble Lord the Member for Wigtonshire (Lord Garlies) is quite right in the interpretation which he has put on the Answer which I gave him the other evening. He is probably aware that the Northern Light Commissioners have, on past occasions, expressed it to be their opinion that the light at Portpatrick, though it might be required for the purposes of the harbour, was not necessary for passing vessels. There is no disposition on the part of the Board of Trade—there could be no disposition on the part of any public Department to put out a light which was shown to be in the least degree useful; and I have now to state, in answer to the Question of the noble Lord, that nothing will be done in the matter to which it relates until further reference has been made to the Northern Light Commissioners, and their opinion taken upon it. If it should be found that the light is of use to passing vessels—a point on which I am not competent of my own knowledge to form an opinion—the Board of Trade will take care that it is not extinguished. As to the correspondence on the subject, I have no objection to its production, beyond that which is often a very good one—the expense which its publication would involve. If the noble Lord wishes to see the correspondence he can have access to everything which the Board of Trade has written on this matter, or if he thinks any public advantage could be gained by taking that course, I have no objection to lay the correspondence on the table. This answer will, I hope, be satisfactory to the noble Lord. With respect to the Question which has been put by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), the House will hardly expect that I, who am not a sailor, should enter into the minute and technical points to which he has drawn its attention. It is, I think, better that I should read a little memorandum which I made this morning, which will prevent me from being inaccurate, and may, probably, be regarded as containing a sufficient explanation on the subject. I understand that the present rule of the road at sea was adopted in this country after the very best professional assistance in framing it had been obtained, and after full discussion with the French Government, I also understand that the advisers of the Trinity House, the Admiralty, the Board of Trade, the Judges of the Admiralty Court in England, and the advisers of the French Government were unanimous on the subject. This agreement was come to in 1862, and since then it has been considered by the advisers of the various maritime States on the face of the earth, and adopted by them all. The rule of the road, therefore, which was agreed to in 1862, is at this moment the rule for the ships of all nations, and England cannot now of herself undertake the responsibility of altering this international law. That, I think, must be obvious to every one who examines the question. But with respect to the particular point to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has more especially invited attention—the alteration which he would wish to see made in the rule bearing upon the position in which ships are when they are said to be nearly end-on—I would say that the matter has been considered since 1862, and another Order of Council explanatory of it issued in July, 1868. I am not sure whether both of the hon. and gallant Gentlemen who spoke on this subject were not members of the Board of Admiralty at the time. Probably they have forgotten what was then done; but I understand that their own Board of Admiralty wrote to the Board of Trade, giving their entire assent to the explanatory clause to which I have referred. That being so, I think I may fairly ask why, when at the Board of Admiralty, the hon. and gallant Gentlemen did not discover those imperfections in the law of which they now complain, and attempt to remedy them? I may state further that the Board of Trade have received many pamphlets and suggestions on various branches of this subject. No two of those pamphlets or suggestions, however, I believe, agree in the recommendations which they make. The rules now in force are, I may add, very simple. They are such that any person may learn them, as a child does a nursery rhyme, in a very short period; and it is impossible that a man sober, in his senses, and not panic-stricken by the events of the moment, should not be able to remember and apply them. They are taught to all masters and mates of ships, who cannot obtain their certificates until they thoroughly understand them. As to the correspondence on this subject, I may say that there are some Papers with respect to it which will shortly be placed on the table, and which will, I believe, include the correspondence on this particular point. If they should not be satisfactory, he will have the opportunity of bringing the matter before the House again. The House must excuse my further entering into the subject. I have given information which I believe to be correct, and I shall be very glad it will meet the case which the hon. Baronet has mentioned.

REDUCTIONS IN THE GOVERNMENT DOCKYARDS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE, in rising to call attention to the destitution at Portsmouth consequent on the discharge of Men from the Dockyard; and to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he intends to take any measures to alleviate that distress by promoting emigration or otherwise, expressed his concurrence in the remarks which had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay). What, however, he now desired more particularly to call the attention of the Government to was the great distress existing in several portions of the kingdom in consequence of the very large reductions which had been made in the dockyards. Into the causes which had led to the discharge of so many of the workmen he had no desire to enter, but the result was very great and wide-spread distress. At Portsmouth last year 1,118 men had been discharged. Against the character of these men nothing had been urged, and after parting bit by bit with their clothing and furniture they had to trust to the assistance of their neighbours for relief. They were too respectable to go into the poor-house. £1,500 had been subscribed at Portsmouth for the purpose of alleviating the distress which the reductions had occasioned, and those who had been discharged were employed upon public works—the money being found by the municipality and the citizens combined, but this was insufficient for the purpose. During the continuance of the distress in Lancashire these men, then the possessors of comfortable incomes and happy homes, came forward with no sparing hand, and they now trusted that the Government would entertain their case with equal consideration. Indeed this was a duty which, in his opinion, the peremptory mode of dismissal that had been adopted rendered imperative upon the Government. His own acquaintance with working men was of a very intimate character, and he did not believe that it was at all consonant with the feelings or wishes of the working men of this country that so many of their brethren should be reduced to distress by being so suddenly and so unexpectedly deprived of their employment. The Mayor of Portsmouth, in a letter which he had written, described the distress which the discharge of so many workmen had occasioned as "deep, dire, urgent, and most heart-rending." It was indeed heart-rending to see gangs of workmen in the prime of life, standing at the corners of the streets with nothing to do. What was desired was this—in Portsmouth alone there were 200 or 300 men who with their families would be glad to emigrate if they had the means of so doing, and he did not think it an unreasonable request if he asked that these men should be assisted to emigrate to Canada, where, according to intelligence they had received, there was every reason to believe they could obtain ample means of subsistence.

MR. J. D. LEWIS said, that as the representative of Devonport, he could fully endorse the statement which had fallen from the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir James Elphinstone) as to the great distress which had been occasioned by the discharge of so many of the dockyard employés. Last year no less than 1,500 were discharged from the Government establishments at Devonport, and he believed he could safely assert that such a wholesale and reckless system of dismissing workmen had never before occurred in the borough. These discharges were attributable solely, he would not say to the fault, but to the act of the late Government, and he was, perhaps, exhibiting some ingratitude in referring to the subject, inasmuch as it was quite possible that, but for what had occurred, he should not have had the honour of addressing the House that evening. He did not mean entirely to blame the late Government in this matter, for when persons got into difficulties they were occasionally obliged to reduce their establishments. Though, however, the servants so discharged, might possibly have no legal claim against their late masters, the latter would not be favourably regarded by society if they altogether turned their backs upon the wretched people who by the loss of their employment had been reduced to distress. He was sure his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty would not fall into any such mistake, and it was with great satisfaction he heard last night that there was to be no further reduction in the number of men employed at Devonport and Portsmouth. His right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty had stated, that of the 4,629 men who had been discharged 2,000 had been employed only from the preceding October, and that they must therefore have known their services were liable at any moment to be dispensed with. But that would still leave more than 2,600 who had been working at their employment for some years, and who, if discharged in so unexpected a manner, were certainly entitled to some slight consideration at the hands of the Government. He trusted that the Answer of his right hon. Friend would be calculated to give satisfaction in this matter.

Sir James Elphinstone

MR. GRAVES said, he was unwilling it should be supposed that the reductions complained of affected solely the localities more immediately concerned. With regret he must say they affected the shipwrights and other artisans connected with the shipping trade throughout the kingdom. This particular branch of the trade of the country was generally pretty well regulated by the law of supply and demand. On the whole, however, the supply might be said to be greater than the demand, and therefore the effect of 2,600 men being suddenly thrown upon the country would be greatly to increase the supply, and thus, to a certain extent, to increase the pauperism of the country. His object in rising was to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, in his reply, to give the House some idea of the terms of the engagement of these men. He had always been under the impression that those engaged in Government Dockyards received lower wages than those who were employed in private yards, and that in consequence they were entitled to the receipt of some pension or gratuity on superannuation or on leaving the service after some time. If that were so, he certainly could not help thinking they had some claim to consideration at the hands of the Government. It might be proper that the Government should wish to carry out a reduction, but it was clear that they ought to avoid anything like a breach of public faith.

MR. STONE said, he was glad that his hon. Colleague (Sir James Elphinstone) with whose sentiments he thoroughly concurred, had confined his remarks to the distress existing in Portsmouth, and that he had not gone into any matters relating to those who were responsible for this distress. It might be asked how it was that men who were discharged last year had not long before this taken steps to obtain employment elsewhere, instead of remaining to be a burden to the rates? but the answer had been supplied by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves), and it was that the depression in the ship building trade was not confined to the dockyards, but was general throughout the country. Therefore there was no opening for those men in their own employment in any other part of the country, and it was of no use their going elsewhere. It might be said that these men took employment with the distinct understanding that they were liable to be discharged at any moment, and therefore they had no legal claim on the Government; but there was a difference between the discharge of one or a few men from one out of other establishments and a wholesale discharge like this from all places where the men could find employment. There was another matter to which he wished to refer, namely—the position of the Government in dockyard towns in connection with the poor rate. The question was whether the Government should not contribute their fair share to the rate in a crisis like this? A great many persons in the towns suffered from the diminution of trade and the increase of the local rates; and although the Government within the last few years had made a contribution to the poor rate in respect of the premises they occupied, they paid a fixed sum, so that their contribution did not vary with the amount which was required to be spent in the place. When the Government increased the rate levied upon the town, by discharging their men, they did not, like private employers of labour, increase their payment to the rate. All he asked was that the Government should recognize these facts and afford help in some way or other.

MR. C. WYKEHAM-MARTIN said, he could assure the House that the distress was as great in the South of England as it was in the West. He would abstain from speaking particularly of the borough which he had the honour to represent (Rochester), although in that place there were men who had served the Government for thirty years and who were now walking the streets in search of employment. He would, however, remark that at Woolwich the distress was extending from the late employés of the dockyard to the poorer class of shopkeepers in the town; and unless the Government would give some assistance, he was afraid the increase of the local burdens of the counties of Hampshire, Devonshire, and Kent would countervail any reduction of the public burdens.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he wished to call attention to the general subject of the employment of workmen in national establishments. Those who had been connected with dockyards, or had represented constituencies which included dockyards, must have observed the critical position in which workmen were placed from time to time. When the idea prevailed that Government dockyards were the proper places in which to build ships there was a demand for workmen. Then there followed a period in which economy was required, which was generally just before the Estimates were proposed; and, to the great injury of the industrial classes, a large number of workmen were discharged, and the greatest distress was produced. It had been his misfortune to see this distress in its horrors and miseries, and it was impossible to describe the effects of it on the families of the unfortunate men. It led him to think it was desirable that these sudden changes should, if possible, be avoided by the adoption of some fixed rule. Was it not possible to employ the men in some other way than in the building and repairing of ships? He had before advocated their employment in breaking up old vessels as preferable to discharging them, and he still considered that desirable. Extraordinary statements had been made in the late Parliament of the loss in which the country was involved by the sale of wooden vessels to be broken up by private ship-breakers. Two, which were originally valued at £80,000 and £40,000, were sold respectively for £28,000 and £26,000, and the stores were re-purchased by the Government for £32,000 and £30,000.

If workmen, instead of being discharged, had been employed in breaking up these ships, their distress might have been greatly mitigated. The late Government, after this suggestion, and when the elections were coming on, employed discharged men at Sheerness and Devonport to break vessels up. He was informed that the distress at Devonport had been much alleviated by two small vessels being broken up in the dockyard at that place. He hoped the First Lord of the Admiralty would ascertain how many vessels that used to be in ordinary were still to be disposed of; and whether he did not think it would answer the purpose of the Government to employ men in breaking them up. Although he hoped that something might be done to assist emigration, he must also observe that when he visited Keyham factory lately, he was informed that men had been discharged from that establishment, while the necessary work upon which they were employed remained unfinished. The same thing, it was alleged, had happened at Devonport Dockyard. He could not understand how that could be called economy. He thought it would be very desirable forthwith to investigate what work there was on hand, with the view of ascertaining whether it would not be true economy to take back some of the men.

MR. CHILDERS: The last time it was my duty to engage in a debate of this kind—when some of the same speakers took part in it as have spoken this evening—was in 1866, when I think six or seven gentlemen representing dockyards declared with one voice how absolutely necessary it was to raise the wages of the dockyard men, because, if their wages were not raised, the men would leave the yards and the Government would get no work done. I was at the Treasury at the time, and I ventured to resist that Motion, and gave good grounds for it. I must say that, having listened very patiently during the last hour to what has been said about the dockyard labourers, and in the light of that discussion reviewed the past, I feel grateful that the Government came to so wise a conclusion in 1866. There is no doubt that if Government had listened to the demands of the hon. Members who urged an increase of pay, the attractions of dockyard towns would have been proportionately increased, and we should at this time have been more loudly called upon to provide from the public revenue compensation to the dockyard towns because labourers have been thrown out of work. Before I answer the specific Questions put by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), let me say a word in reply to what has been stated by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves). I thought I had anticipated the inquiry he addressed to me when replying to a Question last evening on this subject. I then stated very precisely how many men had been discharged from the dockyards, what were their rights to compensation or superannuation, and whether those rights had been respected; and I stated as clearly as I could that everybody who had rights to compensation had had those rights respected. I think I also gave the numbers of those who had been discharged with compensations, and the average amount of compensation, whether in the shape of annual payment or gratuity, they had received. In reply, therefore, to my hon. Friend I would say that the persons who were discharged last year, with a few exceptions, were persons who had been hired on the expressed condition that they would be discharged at short notice without any gratuity if their service was short, and with a certain limited gratuity if their service was long. Having looked into the matter I believe the late Government, under whom the whole of these proceedings occurred, acted justly with respect to these men and the terms upon which they were engaged, and therefore there is no occasion for the apprehension under which my hon. Friend (Mr. Graves) labours. Now, Sir, I will come to the precise Question which has been put to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth. He has called attention to the destitution existing at Portsmouth consequent upon the discharge of men from the dockyards, and he has asked whether the Government is prepared to take a certain course with the view to relieve it. Let me state the nature of this discharge. I have looked very carefully as far as Portsmouth is concerned into the figures with respect to these discharges, and the fact is simply this—According to the Estimates in force before 1868 there were, in round numbers, some 4,800 or 4,900 usually employed in the Portsmouth Dockyard. These numbers have now fallen to about 4,000. The difference, therefore, is not very much if you merely look upon it as a question between the former amount of employment in Portsmouth Dockyard and the present amount; but what really happened was that towards the end of 1867 the late Government decided to engage for a specific purpose — whether wisely or unwisely I will not now inquire — an additional number of men beyond those provided for by the Estimates. Somewhere about 300 or more were so engaged for a short time at Portsmouth, and I understand that a considerable number of these men, attracted by the chance of work, came from the North through the distress in the shipbuilding trade there; we have no official Return, however, to show how many of those men came from distant parts. During the financial year ending with March, 1868, this extra employment continued; but the Government came to a somewhat sudden decision to reduce the number of men, and the numbers in Portsmouth Dockyard between March, 1868, and June, 1868, were reduced altogether by somewhere about 1,650 men. In June, 1868, two months before the close of last Session, the reduction practically ceased, and in fact there are now more hands employed than there were in June last. It is clear, therefore, that the Questions I am now called upon to answer should have been addressed to the late Government in July last, rather than to the present Government, who are not only employing the full number of men employed last June, but are providing in the Estimates of 1869-70, for an additional number beyond those employed last year at Portsmouth, as well as at Devonport, and Chatham. I repeat, that distress which my hon. Friend has brought before the House was occasioned by the discharges of eight months ago, and not at all by anything which has occurred during the latter part of the year. But hon. Members from dockyard towns ask us to consider whether the destitution is of such a character as to justify the Government in resorting to special provisions, involving a charge on the public, for the workmen at these towns. Now, one word as to the cause of this destitution. I do not think the reduction in the numbers at the dockyards such as I have described during the last eighteen months before the increase, in any respect abnormal. Reductions have been made on previous occasions quite as large, but have attracted no special notice. The real fact is, that the reduction in the shipbuilding trade connected with the Government is only a fraction of the reductions in the shipbuilding trade throughout the country. The number of men employed in the Government yards is very few when compared with the number in the trade as a whole, and these discharged men are very few, indeed, as compared with the numbers reduced to absolute poverty by the sudden change which has come over many branches of our trade, especially the shipbuilding trade, during the last few years. It would be altogether wrong to suppose that the former or the present Government are in the least responsible for the present state of things, which is really almost entirely the result of a great wide-spread and well-known distress which has come over the whole of the shipbuilding trade. With respect to Portsmouth, my hon. Friend will forgive me if I am not able to go into much detail, because, although I saw him some short time ago on the matter, I received the explanatory papers from the Mayor of Portsmouth only last Tuesday. But the distress at Portsmouth is by no means solely due to any reduction of the number of dockyard men; on the contrary, I found three very distinct causes of distress at Portsmouth at this moment. The large contract works connected with the fortifications have been suspended, to a very great extent, during the past two months; the extension works at the dockyard, in which men are employed in large numbers by a contractor, have been slack during the winter; the Corporation of Portsmouth, too, has been employing a very large number of men whom they have recently discharged, and these causes have largely contributed to the destitution deplored. That is the general statement I have to make as regards Portsmouth. Then my hon. Friend has suggested that Government should help the men to emigrate; but I am quite sure he will not expect from me anything like a complete reply, considering the matter was brought under the consideration of the Government only three days ago. To any general system of emigration carried on by the Government I should entertain very strong objections. The colonies are coming forward themselves for that purpose.

Hon. Members may have seen by a letter in The Times this morning that there has been a very considerable change of opinion on the subject of emigration in a colony of which I once knew something. But considering the whole course of our policy towards the colonies, nothing, I think, could be more unwise than that we should suddenly embark in a large emigration scheme. Besides, at this moment the Poor Law authorities have power, under an Act of Parliament, to assist emigration; whether that system is workable or not I do not pretend to say, but the power itself exists. I must, therefore, decline giving any positive answer to the Question which has been put to me, beyond pointing out the two considerations to which I have already adverted. I think it is the duty of the Government to exercise its power of discharging men in large numbers from the dockyard with discretion and moderation, and upon some very plain principle. Whether the large discharges last year fulfilled those conditions it is not for me to say. I shall not attempt to go into that question. But my own opinion on the subject generally is perfectly clear; it is, that those who employ large bodies of men, while resisting claims inconsistent with the terms of employment, should, on the other hand, have regard to the time, the manner, and the circumstances in which it is proposed that labour should be thrown back upon the country. That is the only answer I can give to my hon. Friend, stating distinctly at the same time that this is the policy by which I shall be guided as long as I have anything to do with the administration of the Admiralty.

Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. NEWDEGATE: * Sir, the Motion of which I have given Notice, which is, for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the present operation of the Roman Catholic Charities Act of 1860, and into that of the Burials Registration Act of 1864, has been somewhat misapprehended out-of-doors. It has been thought by some persons that this Motion of mine is analogous to the one I made four years ago, and was for a Committee to inquire into the increase of Monastic and Conventual Establishments in this country, into their character and their discipline, with a view to the institution of some system of inspection. At the outset, then, I beg to state that my present Motion is proposed with no such intention as that. The object which I have in view is a very simple one; it is that this House should appoint a Committee for the purpose of ascertaining how far the provisions of the Act of 1860, with respect to Roman Catholic Charities, have been acted upon by the Roman Catholic community; whether the enrolment of trusts, which that Act contemplates, has been carried out in such a manner as to fulfil the intentions of the Legislature; and whether the system of enrolment and the entries in the Rolls Court are such as to afford reasonable security to the public, and the necessary amount of information to those who are desirous of informing themselves with regard to the disposition of the property held under those trusts. In the first place, then, I will deal with that Act; having given my support to Sir Charles Selwyn and Sir William Bovill, when Members of this House, in assisting the then Government, represented by the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis, in passing it through this House. I will go hereafter into the history of that measure; but I would here observe that this statute is of a most liberal character. It removes the difficulties which were formerly interposed between intending donors of property for Roman Catholic religious uses by the Superstitious Uses Act, an Act that forbids the devising of property for prayers for the dead and other purposes, by means of which the Church of Rome, and I believe other Churches also, have accumulated pro-

erty to such an undue extent in every country in Europe, as indeed was the case formerly in this country, that Legislatures generally have been unanimous in their efforts to limit these devises in mortmain. I shall be prepared to show that the Government of France in particular has had to struggle against this difficulty. The Church of Rome in that country has received endowments and accumulated property contrary to the law; and M. Dupin, having in 1861 reported upon the evasions that were practised by the Roman Catholic hierarchy in France, M. Persigny, at that time at the head of the Home Office, issued a decree and exerted himself greatly to abate that which had become a growing evil—namely, the locking up in mortmain of a very large portion of the property and wealth of the nation. The evasions of the law in France took a singular turn. In that country, there are certain congregations and societies connected with the conventual system, and particularly la Société de St. Vincent de Paul, who are employed largely in collecting this property, and after having been pursued by M. Dupin and the French Government from one evasion to another, they came to this—instead of creating any trusts, which might fall under the cognizance of the Government, they invested the whole of the property in a certain M. Baudin, who held the securities, and perpetually changed the coupons so as to prevent the property being traced. I do not know what measures have been recently adopted by the French Government, but I refer to these facts as showing, at all events, the need of supervision which is felt in that country. The other statute which the Motion embraces is that for the Registration of Burials, respecting which I may say that it is in pari materia, because it relates to cemeteries which are held by the Roman Catholic community on the same terms as other property; and it has been proved before the courts of law, in the case of "Smee v. The Oratorians at Brompton," that they not only omitted to register the burials in Roman Catholic cemeteries, but had positively refused to do so. It is a principle laid down by the Bank of England, and by other great institutions having the charge of property, that it is essential not only that the death but the burial of the former owner of the pro-

erty should be registered, inasmuch as the details afforded by the register of death are not always sufficient to convey the information necessary for the proper devolution of the property. Now, the Burials Act passed through both Houses of Parliament without a division; and last year, at the instance of an hon. and learned Friend, I moved an Address to Her Majesty for Returns with regard to its operation, in order to ascertain how far it had been complied with; but although eight months have since elapsed, and the obligation to furnish Returns, as resting on the public officers, survives the Parliament, the Returns have not been any thing like fully made. I find, in short, upon inquiry at the Home Office, that not more than one-third of the proper number of Returns have been furnished, and that these prove a non-compliance with the provisions of the statute. I may venture to assert this because I am prepared to prove it before a Committee. There are, therefore, two Acts which have been passed in recent years, and in reference to which I can show that in the case of neither have the intentions of the Legislature been carried out. It is obvious that legislation is a farce unless the laws which are passed be complied with; and there is no doubt that the enrolment under the Roman Catholic Charities Act, to which I will now refer, is not sufficient to afford to persons who may consider themselves interested in the property held under those trusts the requisite information as to its extent, or as to the ownership, or, in fact, as to who the trustees really are; because I find that a provision of that Act which, in the most liberal sense validated existing trusts, whether the property was held contrary to law or, in accordance with the law of the Roman Catholic community, after twenty years' possession by the trustees; by mere possession or by mere virtue of use, whether the title was originally a good title or not; that the provisions of this statute have been so construed that persons now say that the words of this clause are prospective, that they were not merely intended to validate existing trusts which I believe to have been the purpose of Parliament; but that any one in possession of such property has only to wait twenty years, and whether their possession of the property be in accordance with law or not, they have a good title at the end of the term. This provision, therefore, operates as a direct premium against enrolment, although enrolment is the object of the statute. Now this is, in a certain degree, speculative; but I have pretty good reason for relying upon my information. I understand that although under this Act, in order to gain a good title to the trust property, enrolment must take place in the first instance; no sooner has one set of trustees been enrolled than they may either all resign, except, perhaps, one, and he, being a Roman Catholic Bishop or priest most likely, who would thus become sole trustee, or they may appoint entirely new trustees without the necessity of a fresh enrolment. It is manifest that the intention of enrolment is that there should be a record kept of the existing trustees; but, by means of the proceeding to which I have referred, I am informed that the object of the enrolment is defeated. I have explained to the House that the intention of the Act was to validate possession in Roman Catholic trustees, however they may have acquired the property prior to the year 1861; and there is in the ninth Report of the Charity Commissioners—the only Report which refers to the operation of the Act—a passage which, with the permission of the House, I will read, because it speaks with greater authority than I can. Adverting to the previous state of things, the Charity Commissioners in that Report say, that the temporary exemption of Roman Catholic charities from the operation of the Charitable Trusts Act ceased in 1860. And I should remind the House that the Charitable Trusts Act, which is applicable to the charities of every other denomination, was passed in the year 1853; and it was under this Act that the Charity Commissioners were incorporated, and that the powers granted to them by the Legislature over the charities of other denominations were confirmed. Through the pressure put upon Lord John Russell's Government in that year, the Roman Catholic charities were exempted from the operation of the Charitable Trusts Act, and that exemption was to continue for seven years. The passage in the Commissioners' Report of 1862 is in these words—facilities for supplying the enrolment of existing Roman Catholic endowments, which, though necessary to their legal validity (when comprising real estate), had been omitted during the prevalence of laws specially affecting the Roman Catholic body. Although numerous grants have been enrolled, as in compliance with that Act (approaching to 400 in number), yet the trusts, on which these assurances were made, or which were intended to be attached on the grantees, appear only on a very inconsiderable proportion of the enrolments; and it may, perhaps, be concluded that the administrators of the properties which they comprise have prepared to rely on their practical dedication to public purposes rather than by legalizing their settlement to subject them more directly to the general law, or that the means of making more sufficient enrolments may have been wanting. No Returns have yet been made of the income and expenditure of any such charities, but the time allowed for the transmission of such Returns for the year 1861, the first complete year since the termination of the exemption referred to, has not fully expired.”

The House might have expected, after empowering the Charity Commissioners to validate these trusts by purging them of any expressions that might be held to be contrary to the Superstitious Uses Act, and after directing them to send schemes in all cases to the Court of Chancery, by which—if not the whole, a portion at all events—should be validated in law; that, after making such a concession as that, these powers would have been used by the Roman Catholic hierarchy and the Roman Catholic community. But I have been to the office of the Charity Commissioners, and asked why there is no Return in their subsequent Reports of the operation of this Act of 1860; and the answer I have received is that since the Return, from which I have quoted (that of 1862), only in a few trifling cases have the powers conferred by that Act ever been used. I wish to show in as few words as I can the importance of this subject, because the increase of this Roman Catholic trust property has attained a rapidity which has not for centuries been known until within the last twenty years. The accumulation of the property is going on from day to day and hour to hour in mortmain, and as it appears from these Returns, without the proper authorization of Law, as recommended by the Committee on Mortmain in 1852; beyond the purview of the law, and without the facilities for the acquirement of information on the part of persons who may consider themselves heirs, or who are otherwise interested, which the Committee of 1852 deemed to be most against a Board so constructed, whether lay or ecclesiastical. If it is to be composed of laymen of state nomination, we must view it as a step towards the introduction of faithless and interested politicians to tamper with the independence of our Church, for the purpose of forwarding the anti-Catholic views of men in power, and of promoting their own personal interests. If the Board is to be composed of Bishops similarly appointed, we must regard the novel project of selecting ministerial favourites from the hierarchy as most calculated at once to create divisions in our body, to the well-being of which union and harmony are so essential, and to weaken and finally destroy the confidence of our faithful people, who having expressed so much feverish anxiety at the mention of their clergy being pensioned cannot fail of being alarmed at seeing them accept places and patronage under the Crown. For these and other reasons, which could not be crowded into a short form of declaration, we protest against the Act of Charitable Bequests, and declare our determination to oppose it by all legal and constitutional means in our power."

Let the House consider, then, to what this protest amounts. It is signed by fourteen Roman Catholic Bishops and a thousand priests, and it is a protest against the exercise of the temporal power of the State in any degree over Roman Catholic charitable or conventual property, and is a direct defiance of the law of mortmain, which forbids in this country the validity of any will, made by a dying person within twelve months of death bequeathing property to a religious foundation. The law also invalidates any deed of appointment or gifts to trustees if signed within three months of death for the like purpose. It was a protest signed by the greater part, if not the whole, of the Roman Catholic Bishops and a thousand priests, and it denounces a law passed by this House for Ireland, a law which has been in operation with beneficial effects ever since the year 1844. I am sorry to say that the non-effect or insufficient effect of the Roman Catholic Charities Act passed in 1860, and the non-compliance which we find with the provisions of the Burials Act seems to me to indicate the same determination on the part of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to reject and to repudiate the authority of the State in everything which relates to the property devolving upon that Church. They speak in the protest I have quoted—these Roman Catholic Bishops and clerical protesters—of interference with discipline. Well, Sir, the Legislature of this country has always disapproved of "discipline" being exercised upon the dying for such a purpose as the acquisition of property by a

Church, or indeed by any corporate body in the last hours of expiring mortality. Yet to use these means for acquiring property is what these Roman Catholic Bishops claim as a right, and they denounce the law because—like the law which exists in France and throughout continental Europe, aye, and existed in this country, too, from before the Conquest—it imposes a limitation upon the acquisitiveness of clerical bodies, and especially of the Church of Rome. So very liberal were the provisions of the Act of 1860 that I thought, as the then Government and the House thought, there would be a ready compliance with them; but I confess that I am disappointed, for instead of availing themselves of that enormous boon, the validation of all the property held by them in trust, on the ground of twenty years' user, simple possession of it, whether rightfully or wrongfully, up to the date of the Act, it appears that after the first year subsequent to the passing of the statute there is scarcely any evidence of enrolment; that the enrolments are at all events scanty, and that the system of enrolment in the Rolls Court is such as to create and interpose confusion and difficulty when persons, believing themselves interested, seek to ascertain whether the property is vested in trustees who are amenable to the law. I need hardly quote more of this Report of the Committee of 1852; still there is one passage to which I should like to direct the attention of the House with respect to the original Mortmain Statute of George II.—

"It appears that the fourth requisition which compels enrolment of the deed of gift in the Court of Chancery, is very defective as a means of ensuring publicity, and that there is great difficulty in obtaining evidence of charitable trusts when information is withheld. The general opinion of every witness of importance, with the exception of Dr. Wiseman, who declined to express any opinion on the subject, is that the greatest publicity should be given to all deeds or instruments, settling property for charitable purposes, and to the mode by which the trusts declared by such deeds or instruments are carried into execution. In this opinion your Committee fully concur; and they would suggest that it should be incumbent upon all persons to whom real or personal property is given or bequeathed upon any charitable or religious object, to make a Return either to Commissioners or to some public Board of the nature of the gift and the particular purposes to which it is to be applied."

The Committee then proceeded to show the manner in which secret trusts are created, and other methods, by which the law against mortmain is evaded. A general law, the Charitable Trusts Act, founded upon the recommendation of this Committee, was passed in 1853, and ensures compliance with this recommendation by every religious denomination, with the exception of the Roman Catholic, who claimed to be exempted from the law, and obtained the exemption. That exception, Sir, does not seem to be very much like a love of equality. And it strikes me, that, at a moment when we are contemplating something more stringent than a law of mortmain with respect to the Protestant Church established in Ireland—when we are told that the minority in that country is to be deprived of so large an amount of property, which they hold by an undoubted title, it is especially incumbent upon this House to take cognizance of the operation of the Roman Catholic Charities Act of 1860, and to see whether it has not proved the means of accumulating property in the hands of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in this country to an extent that is not permitted to any other denomination, and by means which enable them to evade the law of mortmain. I will now show you that there is reason to suppose, from the enormous and rapid accumulation of this property, that the relaxation of the law has in practice led to that accumulation of property in the hands of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, that this accumulation has been unprecedented, and that this state of things has been by favour of the law, or rather by an evasion of the law, which restrains all other religious communities in the acquisition of property. I cannot see that there is equality in this. In the year 1864 I brought before the notice of the House the Petition of Mr. Smee, to which I have before referred, who complained that during the last illness of his relative, Mr. Hutchinson, influence was used over him by the late Mr. Faber, the Principal of the Oratorians at Brompton—a society which Mr. Hutchinson had joined—by means of which Mr. Faber obtained a sum of money amounting in all to £40,000, that is to say, by the last bequest, coupled with previous gifts. At that time I quoted an extract from a speech then lately delivered at Malines by the late Cardinal Wiseman, which was to this effect—

“ Allow me now to present to you, by means of statistics, a rapid view of the effect produced by these different measures. The Census gives the population in England—for the year 1831, 13,896,797; for the year 1841, 15,914,148; for the year 1851, 17,927,009; for the year 1861, 20,906,224; an increase of about 2,000,000 in each decennial period. From 1831 to 1841, the population, therefore, increased 14 per cent. In the same period the number of priests increased about 25 per cent, or nearly double. During the following ten years the population increased 13 per cent, the number of priests 45 per cent. Lastly, from 1851 to 1861, while the population increased 12 per cent, the number of priests increased about 37 per cent. Here, again, are the precise statistics which will allow you to judge of the continued increase of the Roman Catholic Church in England. In 1830 we numbered but 434 priests for the whole of England. At present we have 1,242, that is to say, three times as many. The number of our churches, which was 410, has now increased to 872; from 16 convents which we possessed in 1830 in the United Kingdom, we have now, in 1863, 162. Lastly, in 1830, we had not a single religious house of men, in 1850 there were already 11, and to-day their number is 55.”

Such is the account, which was given by Cardinal Wiseman, and he, I suppose, must be held an unimpeachable authority; but I have some other statistics here which are not taken from Roman Catholic sources, and the accuracy of which I have no reason to doubt. These represent that—

“ The increase of Roman Catholic institutions has recently been very great. In 1829 there were no monasteries nor convents publicly announced, and there were but 477 priests, and 449 chapels and stations. In 1841 there were but 1 monastery, 16 convents, and 9 colleges. In 1851 there were 17 monasteries and 53 convents. In the present year there are in England and Wales, 1,122 churches, chapels, and stations, 18 colleges, 214 convents, and 67 communities of men, altogether illegal, with inmates probably amounting to 3,000 males and 13,000 females. In connection with such institutions, real or personal property to a very large amount is, no doubt, fast accumulating, as well as for masses for the dead and other superstitious uses of the Romish religion. If each inmate of a convent bring a dowry of say £250, this would amount alone to upwards of £3,000,000.”

It is perfectly clear that all these communities must have property to sustain them; and I think it is but fair to infer that their property has increased in something like the proportion of the number of priests and of the inmates which these establishments have to maintain, if not in a greater ratio; because it is a well-known fact that the conventual property, held by the Church of Rome is generally of a profitable nature, because the sum required with each nun represents on an average a larger amount than the capital required to provide for her, and that there remains a surplus over and above the expenditure on the maintenance of the establishments. I have adverted to the declaration of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland that they claim the right of obtaining from persons, who are languishing on their death-beds, a large amount of property, and that they denounce the law, which places a restriction upon them, in common with the clergy of every other denomination. But there are other means by which the Church of Rome obtains property. I have another case here; and if the House will allow me, as it is very brief, I will state it in the words in which I have it—

“In January, 1855, a lady of the name of Thompson became a Roman Catholic, was received into the Romish Church by Father Faber—the same person who obtained the property of Mr. Hutchinson, to whom I have referred—who became her confessor, and in November, 1859, she entered the Carmelite Convent at Paris. Father Faber made all the arrangements; the lady paid £1,000 as dowry, she took the vows of obedience, chastity, and poverty; and subsequently she assumed the black veil, and executed a deed, by which she assigned the whole of her property to Mr. Hope Scott and Mr. Sergeant Bellasis for the benefit of the Oratory at Brompton. Lord Romilly decided, that Miss Thompson being under duress was not a free agent, and that the Court would not use its control over the property, until it was satisfied that she had not been influenced by her vows in the disposal of it.”

—I think we have had some illustrations of this hard by within the last few days—

Now, when we find such a vast amount of property accumulating in the hands of the Roman Catholic hierarchy; when in our courts of law such cases as this appear; when we observe a systematic determination evinced to evade the provisions of the law which we have passed; when we are informed, that the system of enrolment is defective—and we are so informed by the Charity Commissioners; when it appears, that the Law of England is more relaxed, and unduly relaxed, to the detriment of the families of Englishmen, than the Law of Ireland, although that to a great extent is a Roman Catholic country; surely all this demands and requires careful investigation, and I am not unreasonable in asking the House to accede to my Motion for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the subject. Were I to adopt another course, and move for Returns, I should be told that I was entailing upon the officers of the Rolls Court an undue amount of labour; and I know that that would be the case, owing to the confused manner in which the trusts are registered; and perhaps I should not have better success than I had upon the Address to Her Majesty requesting that directions be sent to those whose duty it was to afford information with regard to the registration of burials, and whose non-compliance with the Order of the House I have already adverted to. This matter, Sir, has many bearings. I cannot help thinking that this House in 1860, in its anxiety to meet the objections raised by the Roman Catholic Members of the House, adopted words, particularly in the fifth clause of the Act, which afford a loophole for the carrying out on the part of the Church of Rome, in defiance of the Law of Mortmain, a system, to which this country should no more submit than the Government of France or Italy, or any other Government in Europe. There is nothing new in these attempts on the part of the Roman Catholic hierarchy to accumulate this property. No doubt they consider it to be their duty to do so; but unfortunately in the process they bring themselves into collision with the temporal power in every State in Europe. Indeed it seems as if the doctrine they put forth on this subject were adverse to the common sense of mankind. Even our Roman Catholic ancestors resisted much more sternly and much more effectually than we do now all such attempts. If hon. Members would only look back at the statutes passed in the reigns of Edward I. and Richard II., through the dynasties of the Houses of Lancaster and York, centuries before the Reformation, they will find one perpetually renewed catena of statutes forbidding this abuse. In arguing, therefore, that we should take means to inform ourselves as to the operation of our own law, I do it for a purpose, which I have in common with the laity of the Roman Catholic Church in the past and in the present, and in every country in Europe. Look, for example, at what has happened in Italy. There, under the influence of the Papacy, the laws of mortmain were left unenforced, and the result was that such an amount of property accumulated in the hands of monasteries, not profitable to the State, that at last the time came, in 1850, when the Siccardi law was adopted, and I shall be prepared to show—[“Oh!”]—though I do not wish to annoy any Members of the House, the enormous amount of property which the State has recovered for the benefit of the people. Not only was the law of 1850 carried out in 1855, but in the year 1861 another law was passed appropriating to the State a still larger portion, almost the whole of the remainder of the monastic and conventual property; not to be employed for the ordinary uses of the State, the purposes of defence or the requirements of commerce, but to provide for the education of the people. For one of the most remarkable circumstances in Italy was that, although there were thousands of priests who ought to have been the teachers of the people, there was no country in Europe in which the people were so untaught. In Italy, then, the State has, by a violent and convulsive effort, had to make up for its past neglect, a neglect of centuries, in not enforcing the law of mortmain against the undue accumulation of this property by the Roman Catholic Church; and after much pain and trouble, after placing itself in a position of hostility to the Church of Rome, and after being in an antagonism to it that has rocked society to its foundations, the time has come when this abuse of accumulating a large amount of property in the hands of those who do not use it for purposes which are profitable or beneficial to the community, has been put an end to. For, in their case, they did not teach the people; and I can show from statistics that ignorance prevailed most where the monasteries had the largest portion of the property in their possession; in fact, that in proportion to the accumulation of property in their hands did popular ignorance prevail. That was reported to the Italian Parliament, and now the State has resumed possession of the greater portion of the property. I need scarcely say any thing more to prove that the law of mortmain ought to be enforced as much against clerical bodies as against secular. Why, so jealous has the Legislature been on this subject that there is an Act in existence which prevents any lay corporation, associated for the purpose of promoting literature or the fine arts, from holding more than two acres of land, and the Board of Trade is bound to see that they do not acquire more. There is nothing peculiar, therefore, in the restriction. In feudal times the State found that the possession by monastic houses and conventual establishments of these enormous properties had the effect of depriving it of the services of its subjects, and of weakening the defence of the realm. And now, when a trust is created for religious or charitable uses, 10 per cent is charged at first under the succession duty; but never after that is any succession duty paid; whilst, if the property were held by individuals or a family, upon every devolution of the property that tax would be levied. Thus the property in mortmain pays 10 per cent once for all, and never pays again. The right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister appears to have felt this, for, two or three years since, he proposed to make charitable property liable to the income tax, although he was met with such opposition that he was obliged to abandon the proposal. Wherever this accumulation of property in mortmain has taken place, it has been found to be detrimental to the nation alike materially, financially, and morally; and, although I am unwilling to detain the House, I am desirous of showing why the House has reason to be careful. When the law of 1861 had passed in Italy, for this disposal of conventual and monastic property, Cardinal Antonelli issued a circular, in which he warned all purchasers and intending purchasers of that property, that where property had ever belonged to the Church of Rome, no adverse title would ever be acknowledged by the Church; against the acquisition of that property by any layman he proclaimed the doctrine nullum tempus occurrit Ecclesiæ to its full extent; and it was but the other day that Dr. Manning, the head of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in this country, was in Rome; and whilst at Rome, on St. Thomas's Day, he is reported by the Weekly Register, a Roman Catholic organ, to have said—

“We are so used to hear the phrase of ‘national property,’ to hear sacrilegious spoliation spoken of as a matter of State necessity, that we have ceased to be shocked at it as we should. We forget that all that the piety of the faithful has laid at the feet of the Apostles belongs to God, and that no worldly hand can lawfully touch it.”

Here, then, we have a distinct enunciation of the doctrine that nullum tempus occurrit Ecclesiæ. Therefore it behoves this House to see that the law is not tampered with; for if once property falls into the hands of the Church of Rome, that Church will never acknowledge a good title in any one to whom the State may transfer it. "We are so used to hear the phrase of 'national property,'" says Dr. Manning, "to hear sacrilegious spoliation spoken of as a matter of State necessity, that we have ceased to be shocked at it as we should." When I read this, I could not help feeling that it would have been well if Manning had bethought him of that opinion before he wrote his letter to Lord Grey, recommending the disendowment of the Protestant Church in Ireland. It appears to me, Sir, that the authorities of the Church of Rome will not accept in their own case the law which is applied to other religious denominations, or acknowledge in others the right which they claim for themselves. It is a spirit against which Parliament has ever had to struggle; and I hope that, by consenting to the appointment of this Committee, the House will inform itself whether the two statutes to which I have referred, and the consideration of which I propose, are not practically insufficient, if not a dead letter, for the purposes contemplated and intended by the Legislature.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act 23 and 24 Vic. c. 134, being an Act to amend the Law regarding Roman Catholic Charities, and into that of any Acts passed subsequently to the passing of the above mentioned Act, which may or may have been held to modify or alter the operation of the above Act, or which relate to the subject matter thereof; and into the operation of the Act 52 Geo. 3, c. 146, and into that of the 27 and 28 Vic. c. 97, which Acts relate to the Registration of Burials."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

STANNARIES BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ST. AUBYN, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill for amending the Law relating to Mining Partnerships within the Stannaries of Devon and Cornwall, and to the Court of the Vice Warden of the Stannaries, said, the measure had not for its object to legislate for one part of the country in prejudice to the rest—it had reference to a state of things which existed in Devon and Cornwall alone, and nowhere else. It was not a penal or a restrictive Bill, but an enabling measure to bring the existing law into harmony with local circumstances, and to remove the restrictions which impaired the utility and hampered the jurisdiction of the Stannaries Court. That Court had a jurisdiction of two kinds—a common law and an equitable jurisdiction, and the Bill had reference chiefly to the latter. That equitable jurisdiction extended to all disputes arising out of mining transactions in Devon and Cornwall; mines worked on the cost-book system—as nearly all the mines in those counties were—being entirely under the control and regulation of the Stannaries Court. The House would, therefore, see of what vast importance it was to the mining interests of the West of England that the proceedings of a Court having so extensive and peculiar a jurisdiction should be rendered as cheap, as simple, and as expeditious as possible. The Bill had another object of equal if not greater importance, which was to bring the cost-book system to a certain extent within the general law which regulated public companies. The Acts of Parliament which regulated public companies in England did not apply to mines in Devon and Cornwall, inasmuch as these, being cost-book mines, were not in the nature of public companies, but were private partnerships, and by Section 63 of the Joint-Stock Companies Act of 1844 they were expressly excepted from the operation of that Act. The House would naturally desire to have some information as to the nature of the cost-book system, which was simply this—When it was determined to work a mine the adventurers assembled and divided the whole adventure into a certain number of shares, which they allotted as they thought proper, and then applied for a licence to search for ore, followed afterwards by a sett or lease. They appointed one person to act as manager, who kept what was called the "cost-book." In that book the manager entered the names of the shareholders, the resolutions passed at the meetings, the calls, dividends, and accounts, and generally everything relating to the management and engagements of the mine. The adventurers met at stated intervals—generally of two months—and proceeded to audit the accounts. If the adventure had been favourable, they declared dividends; if unfavourable, calls were made to meet the expenses incurred. The partners had the power of transferring or relinquishing their shares at pleasure, and without consulting their co-partners, and in the latter case the shares became extinct. From what he had said the House would see that mining adventures under the cost-book system were very different from trading partnerships on the one hand, or joint-stock companies on the other, for not only could the partners transfer and abandon their shares at pleasure, but the management of the undertaking was not invested in any Board of Directors, but was under the immediate and direct control of the whole body of adventurers. They also differed from joint-stock companies essentially in this respect, that the adventure alone was divided into shares, and that there was no money capital, subscribed or unsubscribed, on which calls could be made. The system was deficient in many respects. Calls were made at present only after a meeting of shareholders for auditing the accounts, and could be made only to meet expenses already incurred. It was proposed by this Bill to give the shareholders power, with certain restrictions, to make calls in anticipation of expenditure to be incurred. It had been held that accounts could be legally audited and calls consequently made only when a majority of the whole of the shareholders were present; and it very often appeared to be the interest of particular shareholders to prevent a full meeting from being held, and therefore they stopped away themselves and induced others to do so. It was proposed in this Bill to give the majority of the shareholders present at a meeting, either in person or by proxy, power to audit the accounts, and make a call should they think it desirable. A call at present was nothing more than an agreement among the shareholders to pay, and there was no power to enforce payment except on application to the Stannaries Court, which might give authority to sell the share. It was proposed by the Bill to give the shareholders the same authority of declaring the shares of a defaulter forfeited as was possessed at present by joint-stock companies, and, further, a power to bring an action at law against a person whose liability might not be satisfied by the sale of his shares, or for any claim on him by the company. It was in the power of any adventurer at present entirely to relinquish his share, and in that case the share became dead or extinct. The Bill proposed that it should be kept alive, and that it should be in the power of the rest of the shareholders to sell or dispose of the share in the same manner as a forfeited share in a joint-stock company. There was also an important provision with regard to the sale of a mine. At present the majority of the adventurers had power to sell the material of a mine, but it required the consent of every single shareholder to sell the lease. There were sometimes 5,000 or 6,000 shares in a mine, some of whom might be in the name of infants, trustees, lunatics, or residents abroad, and that provision practically operated as a perfect bar towards making a good title to a mine. It was therefore proposed by this Bill that, under certain careful restrictions, a majority of three-fourths of the adventurers being present at a meeting specially assembled should have power to sell the whole mine, lease and all. He believed that if that power had existed, many mines in Cornwall which within the last few years had been stopped would now be working. Another important provision of the Bill related to the winding up of mining properties. It was proposed that, in case of the bankruptcy or failure of a mine, the miners, clerks, and others employed about the mine should have priority of claim for wages, &c., to the amount of not exceeding three months' salary. It was also proposed to limit the liability of shareholders for the debts of a mine, which at present extended to all debts incurred by the mine within six years, to liability for debts contracted within two years previous to the shareholders' name being removed from the cost-book. There were certain other provisions of minor importance in the first part of the Bill, and the second part of the measure related entirely to the interior working of the Court of the Vice Warden of the Stannaries. In Cornwall they did not possess, within their narrow limits, the capital necessary to develop the vast mineral wealth existing below the surface; and it was the interest of all classes there, of the lords of the soil, the merchants who supplied the materials of the mines, and the working miners, to induce capital from other sources to flow towards them, not by holding out illegitimate attractions, but by offering that common security against fraud and dishonesty which it met with elsewhere. This measure had this object in view, and such were the principal provisions of the Bill, which had been framed with a view to carry out the unanimous wishes of the whole district to which it applied. It had been drawn up, not in haste, but after the most careful and elaborate discussion at general and other meetings, and it was conceived in an honest and fair spirit, which he hoped would recommend it to the favour of the House. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the law relating to mines, which had been explained by the hon. Gentleman with great clearness, was attended with a great deal of intricacy, and might be simplified with great advantage. Many of the provisions proposed in this Bill were considerable improvements in the Law, so far as he had been able to follow them in the hon. Gentleman's speech, and though it would be premature to express an opinion until they had the Bill itself before them, there could be no possible objection to the introduction of the measure, to the main part of which he was inclined to think they would be disposed to agree when it reached a further stage.

COMMITTEE.

Acts read; considered in Committee.

MR. SELWIN-IBBETSON, in rising to propose that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law for Licensing Beerhouses, and to make certain alterations with respect to the sale by retail of Beer, Cider, and Wine, said, that, as he understood there would be no objection offered to the introduction of the measure, he would not then attempt to state the reasons which led him to bring it forward, or adduce the arguments by which he hoped at a future stage to justify his having done so. He might, however, remark that the importance of that question to the social well-being of the country could hardly be exaggerated; and he hoped to be able on the second reading to show that the remedy he proposed would, in some way, meet the evils complained of. The hon. Gentleman concluded by making his Motion.

Mr. St. Aubyn

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law for Licensing Beerhouses, and to make certain alterations with respect to the sale by retail of Beer, Cider, and Wine.

SEA BIRDS PRESERVATION BILL.

LEAVE.

MR. SYKES, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill for the Preservation of Sea Birds, said, it was with much diffidence that he presumed to bring before the notice of the House a measure which sought to give some legislative protection to those sea birds which still remained on our English coasts. The Bill was not only framed in accordance with the strongly-expressed feeling of almost every class of his constituency (East Riding of Yorkshire), but from the numerous letters he had received from all parts of England, evincing the warmest sympathy with its objects, he was led to regard it as one of almost national interest. The sea birds of England were rapidly disappearing from our coasts. That fact had been established at the last annual meeting of the British Association. From Northumberland, Durham, Yorkshire, Norfolk, Devonshire, Cornwall, and Pembrokeshire, the same cry arose. His Bill aimed at protecting those sea birds during the breeding season; and there was a very important precedent for it in a rigid statute passed in the 25th year of the reign of Henry VIII., protecting sea birds at that very season. RATING OF MINES.—QUESTION.

MR. ST. AUBYN said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill, during the present Session, to provide for the assessment of Metalliferous Mines to the Poor Rate and other local rates?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, a Bill of that kind was under consideration; but it was doubtful whether the pressure of Business would allow the Government to introduce it to the House this Session.

THE HERNE BAY OYSTER GROUNDS.

QUESTION.

MR. PEMBERTON said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is true that H. M. S. the Buzzard was recently ordered to Herne Bay by the Admiralty, acting under the advice of the President, for the purpose of protecting the Herne Bay Oyster Company from a threatened attack by some fishermen upon their Oyster Grounds, such Grounds being declared by the Company's Act to be within the county of Kent for the purpose of trying and punishing all offences committed against them; and upon whose representation, and founded upon what evidence, such attack was apprehended; whether it is the intention of the President generally to advise the Admiralty to employ Her Majesty's Ships to act as Marine Police in protecting Fisheries in lieu of the local authorities; and, to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether it is the fact that, owing to the want of depth of water off that coast, the soundings of which are shown on the Admiralty chart, H. M. S. Buzzard could not get within four or five miles of the Oyster Grounds in question; and whether there is any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Orders under which the Commander of the Buzzard proceeded to Herne Bay, and whether the Commander has made any report to the Admiralty of his expedition, and, if so, whether there is any objection to produce it; and what will be the probable cost of the voyage?

MR. BRIGHT said, the circumstances referred to were quite unknown to him until he saw them stated in the Notice Paper. The facts were that Mr. Pennell, Inspector of Oyster Fisheries, made a Report to the Board of Trade that what was called a raid might be expected on the oyster fisheries, upon which the Company had spent more than £100,000, under an Act of Parliament; and, his statement having been confirmed by other evidence, the case was reported to the Admiralty, with a request that the Admiralty would see the outrage was not committed. But he understood that not long ago—indeed, he was not sure whether at this moment there was not a gunboat in the Frith of Forth, employed in protecting some fisheries of which the Duke of Buccleuch was the proprietor either partially or wholly. As for the future, it was impossible to state any precise rule; each case must be dealt with as it arose.

MR. CHILDERS, replying to the second portion of the Question, said, there was not sufficient water to allow the Buzzard to approach very near the coast, and that was duly reported to the Admiralty. He would gladly show the hon. Member all the Papers in the case, if he would call at the Admiralty; and he would then be able to form an opinion whether they were worth printing. As to the question of cost, the Buzzard used about thirteen tons of coal from the time she left Sheerness for Herne Bay till she returned to port; and the coal cost about 18s. a ton. He was in communication with the Home Office respecting the circumstances under which vessels of war ought to be sent to protect individual fisheries in English waters against intruders.

JUDGMENTS ON ELECTION PETITIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of the Judgments from time to time delivered by the Judges appointed to try Election Petitions, setting forth the grounds of the Certificates and Reports presented to this House in the case of such Petitions, in order that Members of this House may have authoritative information of the existing state of the Law as judicially declared with respect to Corrupt Practices at Elections; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to introduce a Bill for the further amendment of the Laws relating to Corrupt Practices at Elections?

MR. BRUCE said, the judgments were not in the possession of the Home Secretary, nor under the authority of the Home Office; he was therefore unable to order the production of the documents in question. Under the Act, a reporter from the House of Commons was ordered to attend and take down the evidence given at each trial of an Election Petition, but no directions had been given with regard to the judgments, and he was not aware whether any authentic record of them existed. With respect to the latter portion of the Question, the course the Government intended taking was indicated by the Notice of Motion he had given a few minutes before.

POOR LAW—PAYMENT OF RATES BY OWNERS.

QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether there is any legal limit to the amount of indemnity which overseers are apparently empowered to allow to owners of house property for the risk and inconvenience incurred by them in undertaking, by agreement with their tenants, the payment of rates due in respect of such property; if so, what is such limit, and by what Statute or Statutes is such limit fixed?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that the overseers were not entitled to allow any indemnity to owners, for the risk of undertaking the payment of rates. Where the owners were allowed a reduction in their assessments in consequence of such an undertaking, the arrangement was entered into by a connivance between the parties, but that arrangement was not legal. There was no legal indemnity in Parliamentary boroughs, but beyond the Parliamentary boroughs there is power given to the overseers when the Small Tenements Act is adopted to indemnify them to the extent of 25 per cent of the liability imposed upon the landlords, and 25 per cent additional in cases where they compounded for empty houses.

ARMY—CARTRIDGE MAKING.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, On what grounds he refuses to permit the invention of Mr. Groundwater for the re-adaptation of used musket cartridge cases to be tested, so as to ascertain whether or no a considerable saving might not be effected in the consumption of cartridges; and, if it be not the fact that the machinery used by the Government is adapted only for the original construction of the cartridge case, and not for its re-adaptation for service?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, the Director General of Ordnance was perfectly satisfied with the machinery at present in use, by which a large number of cartridge cases had already been re-adapted.

METROPOLIS — OPEN SPACES OF ST. JAMES'S PARK.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he intends taking any steps to restore and preserve the grass in the open spaces of St. James's Park, and otherwise to improve its condition; and, whether, in his opinion, the guardianship and supervision of the Park might not be rendered more efficient, with the view to prevent its being the resort of vagrants, paupers, and criminals?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, that steps were taken to preserve and renew the grass; but, as his hon. Friend was aware, it was very difficult to keep it in order, as a large number of poor people resorted to the Park during the summer, and derived great enjoyment from sitting on the grass—an enjoyment which he (Mr. Layard) would be the last to wish to curtail. The Parks would this year, for the first time, be placed under the supervision of the police, who would endeavour to keep out improper characters; but, as his hon. Friend was aware, it was not always possible to detect a criminal by his dress.

THE SHRIEVALTIES OF YORKSHIRE AND LANCASHIRE.—QUESTION.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any Bill will be introduced, during the Session, to divide the shrievalties of Yorkshire and Lancashire or either of those counties?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, a Bill had been prepared for dividing the shrievalty of Yorkshire; but the question of doing the same for Lancashire having been raised, it was thought better to defer the introduction of the Bill until it should be decided whether it was desirable that it should be made applicable to both counties.

CONVEYANCE OF FEVER PATIENTS. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON-DAMER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there is any legislative provision that all fever patients should be conveyed to all fever hospitals in carriages provided for that purpose by the hospitals?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that the use of such carriages was not compulsory; but that by the Sanitary Act of 1866 nuisance authorities might provide and maintain carriages for the conveyance of fever patients.

RATING OF WOODS.—QUESTION.

MR. KEKEWICH said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he proposes to introduce any measure, during the present Session, on the subject of rating woods not being saleable underwoods?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, the question was under consideration, but as in the case of metalliferous mines, he doubted whether the business of the Session would allow legislation on the subject.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why certain Returns connected with the Metropolis Local Management Act, moved for and granted on the 3rd of April, 1868, have not yet been presented?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in reply, said, the Returns related to local taxation in the metropolis, and the reason of the delay was the non-return of answers to the inquiries of the Home Office from some of the local authorities. Part of the information asked for was already contained in Returns before the House, and still more would be seen in a comprehensive Return, moved for by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the close of the last Session. He would communicate with the hon. Member, and take steps to obtain, with as little delay as possible, such of the desired information as was not already before Parliament.

ECCLIESIASTICAL TITLES ACT REPEAL BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the second reading of this Bill stood nominally for Thursday next, but he believed it was put down for that day merely with a view to fix the time when the second reading would in reality be taken. He wished to know, Whether the hon. Member for Meath had fixed on the day when it would come on?

MR. MAC EVOY, in reply, said, he did not propose to take the second reading before Easter.

COMMITTEE.

Acts 39 and 40 Geo. 3, c. 67, 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 37, 1 and 2 Vic. c. 109, 35 Geo. 3, c. 21 (Ireland), 40 Geo. 3, c. 85 (Ireland), 8 and 9 Vic. c. 25, and Resolution [7th May 1868] relative to the Established Church (Ireland) read, and considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GLADSTONE: The Motion, Sir, which, in concluding, I shall propose to the Committee is—

“That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to put an end to the Establishment of the Church in Ireland, and to make provision in respect of the Temporalities thereof, and in respect of the Royal College of Maynooth.”

I do not know, Sir, whether I should be accurate in describing the subject of this Resolution as the most grave and arduous work of legislation that ever has been laid before the House of Commons; but I am quite sure I should speak the truth if I confined myself to asserting that there has probably been no occasion when the disproportion was so great between the demands of the subject that is to be brought before you and the powers of the person whose duty it is to submit it. I will not, however, Sir, waste time in apologies that may be considered futile, and the more so because I am conscious that the field I have to traverse is a very wide one, and that nothing but the patient favour and kindness of the Committee can enable me in any degree to attain the end I have in view—namely, that of submitting with fulness and with clearness both the principles and the details of a measure which, as far as regards its principles, is singularly arduous, and, as far as regards its details, must necessarily embrace matter of a character highly complex and diverse. Now, I cannot but be aware that, under ordinary circumstances, any one who undertakes to introduce to the House of Commons a subject of grave constitutional change ought to commence by laying his ground strongly and broadly in historical and political reasons. On this occasion I shall feel myself in the main dispensed from entering upon them. Under ordinary circumstances, in discussing the subject of the Church of Ireland—I mean had nothing already occurred in this House or elsewhere in relation to it on which I might take my stand—I should endeavour to pass in review the numerous—I may say the numberless and powerful arguments which, in my opinion, may be adduced to prove that this Establishment cannot continue to exist with advantage to itself or without mischief to the country. I should be prepared to show how many benefices there are in Ireland where, although there is a Church population, it can hardly be said to be more than an official Church population, for the members of those benefices are too often restricted to those whom we may reasonably suppose to be supplied by the families of the clergyman, the clerk, and the sexton. I should show, Sir, how buttresses have been devised for the maintenance of this extraordinary system, in the shape of those grants from the Consolidated Fund in this country, on the one hand to the Presbyterians under the form of the Regium Donum, and on the other hand to the Roman Catholics under the form of the Maynooth Grant, without which it was felt that the maintenance of such an Establishment in Ireland would be intolerable and impossible. I should endeavour to show how Parliament had been so conscious of the difficulties attending the position which it has held, that it has actually been reduced upon more than one occasion to waste away, by positive provisions of legislation, the property of the Church, in order that its magnitude, compared with the duties, might not too much shock the public mind. I should endeavour to show how, in past times, and through all the evil years of the penal legislation that has affected Ireland, the authorities of this Established Church have, unfortunately, stood in the foremost rank with respect to the enactment of those laws on which we cannot look back without shame and sorrow.

Sir, of the Established Church in Ireland I will only say that, although I believe its spirit to have undergone an immense change since those evil times, yet, unfortunately, it still remains, if not the home and the refuge, yet the token and the symbol of ascendancy, and, so long as that Establishment lives, painful and bitter memories of ascendancy can never be effaced. But, Sir, instead of lengthened discussion upon this and kindred topics, I hope I shall be sufficiently justified in passing at once to the measure of the Government by a reference to recent occurrences. In form, without doubt, this is the first—the very first stage of a great political measure, liable and open at every point to controversy; but in substance we cannot dismiss from our view that we are virtually taking up, and are bound to prosecute, the unfinished labours of last year. I refer, Sir, to those debates which formed the main, almost the only, subject of party difference in the discussions of this House during the Session of 1868. I refer to the large majority which, in a House of Commons undoubtedly Conservative in its general spirit, affirmed, notwithstanding, the necessity of bringing the system of religious Establishment in Ireland to a close. I refer to the autumn spent in incessant discussions of this subject before every constituency in the country. I refer to the Elections in which the issue so clearly put was not less decisively answered. And lastly, but not least, I refer to that resignation of the late Administration on which I have not to pronounce one word of censure, but about which I am sure I am justified in stating that it was an unusual course. I have not one word of censure to utter; but assuredly I am justified in saying that it forms the most emphatic testimony to the character of that judgment which has already been pronounced by the representatives and by the people of the Three Kingdoms. Nor shall I dwell in any detail upon the counter-arguments which have been ably, sincerely, and persistently used in defence of the Established Church. If I name them, it is to do little more than to say that we are responsible for this measure, and we, who on this side are pledged to its general principles, shall be ready upon every due occasion, with all respect to those who oppose us, to meet those counter-arguments. It is said that the measure we are about to introduce will be adverse to religion. I believe it to be favourable to religion, and to be essential to the maintenance of those principles of right on which every religion must rest. We shall be told, more especially, that it is adverse to the interests of Protestantism; but we shall point to the condition of Ireland, and shall argue from the facts of that condition that the interests of Protestantism have not been promoted, but, on the contrary, have been injured by our perseverance in a system which reason does not justify. We shall be told, perhaps, that we are invading the rights of property. No possible confidence can be greater than that with which we shall meet that argument. On former occasions, indeed, things have been done by Parliament, under the extreme pressure of the case, which it may be difficult to reconcile with the extreme assertion of the rights of property. There are clauses—and important clauses—of the Church Temporalities Act of 1833 which greatly strain the abstract theory of the rights of property, and which I, for one, am totally unable to reconcile with its general rules. But so far as I know there is no imputation that can fairly be made against the measure we propose with respect to the rights of property by any other persons than those who hold what appears to me the untenable—I may even say the extravagant—doctrine that although Parliament has a perfect right to direct the course of the descent of property in the case of natural descent, lineage by blood, yet it has no right, when once the artificial existence of what we call a corporation has been created, to control the existence of that corporation or to extinguish it even under the gravest public exigency. Well, we shall be told also of the Act of Union; and I cannot, nor shall I attempt to, dissemble that on a point which has been described as essential we propose to alter that Act. The Act of Union has been altered on other occasions, though never for so grave a cause as this; but we shall confidently contend that while we are altering this particular provision of the Act of Union, we are confirming its general purport and substance, and labouring, to the best of our humble ability, to give it those roots which unfortunately it has never yet adequately struck in the heart and affections of the people. And lastly, Sir, this claim I, for one, confidently—boldly make on behalf of the measure that we are introducing—I say we are giving effect to the spirit of a former policy. The great Minister who proposed the Act of Union neither said nor believed that it would be possible, under a legislative Union, to maintain the system of religious inequality which he found subsisting in Ireland. On the contrary, he has left upon record his strong conviction that the countenance and support afforded from national sources to the Established Church must be extended to the other religions of the country. I admit that we pursue religious equality by means different from those proposed by Mr. Pitt—[Mr. NEWDEGATE: Hear, hear!]

—but by means, as I believe, better suited to the purpose we have in view, and certainly more consonant to the spirit, to the opportunities, and to the possibilities of the times in which we live. Be that, however, as it may, and with all that allowance for difference of means, the end we have in view is the same, and for that end we are entitled to quote the great authority of Mr. Pitt, and the authority of many of those who have followed him in their public career.

Sir, having referred to what I venture to call—although not in any technical or formal sense—the previous stages of this measure, I will briefly remind the Committee of the character of the general declarations by which the late House of Commons was moved to action, and of those pledges—for I do not hesitate to recognize them as such to the country—which we are now called upon to do our best to redeem. I think, Sir, it was well understood to be the view of those who supported the Resolutions of last year that the system of Church Establishment in Ireland must be brought thoroughly and completely to a close—that although the word “disendowment” was never embodied in any Resolution of this House, nor, so far as I recollect, was ever accepted without qualification in the speeches of those who most prominently supported the proposed Resolutions, yet, as a general rule, and for every substantial purpose and effect, an end must likewise be put to the system of the public endowment of religion in Ireland. While the principles of the measure were laid thus broad and deep, it was likewise professed, and I think, to a great degree, accepted by the House, that in all the details, in all the modes of application, the rules not only of justice, but of equity, and not only of equity, but, within every reasonable limit, even of indulgence, should be followed. And while the measure was thus to be thorough and thus to be liberal, there were two other great characteristics which, in order fully to realize the desire we entertain, it ought to possess. The first of these, Sir, is, in my judgment, that the measure ought to be prompt in its operation; for it is not for the interest of those with whom we deal any more than it is for the interest of the country that—I will not say the Irish Church, but—the Irish Establishment should be subjected to the pain of a lingering death. That promptitude of operation cannot be absolute; it must necessarily be checked by considerations arising out of the vested interests with which we have to deal. But yet, subject to those rules of right and of prudence, it is an object which we ought to have in view in the prosecution of our work. And, lastly, Sir, there is another characteristic which, perhaps, has hardly yet been mentioned in debate, but which appears to me second to none in its importance as determining the value of the provisions of a measure such as this. It is, that the legislation which we now propose, so far as the Irish Church is concerned, so far as the subjects of religious controversy growing out of legislative establishment in the sister island are concerned, shall be final legislation; that it shall put away, out of sight, out of hearing, out of mind if it may be, this long-continued controversy—a controversy almost of generations; and that even should it necessarily happen, as commonly happens in the train of great statutes, that in this or that point of detail it may require to be either developed or amended, yet the Bill which we propose shall leave no question of principle unsolved, and shall permit every man who takes part in its discussion to hope that when it finally departs from within the walls of Parliament we shall have heard the very last and latest of the controversy on the Irish Church. Subject, then, to those great principles, it is our duty—and I am sure it will be recognized to be our duty—to seek every means of softening the transition that is about to be effected. We must not disguise from ourselves that we are calling upon persons, upon large classes, upon individuals entitled to great respect, to undergo a great change in their position under the direct action of law. And every motive that can appeal to the feelings of men of honour and of gentlemen must lead us, I think, to feel it a duty so to proceed that this measure shall carry with it no unnecessary penalty or pain.

Sir, I am bound to say that I think many of those who may be expected and considered to take a special interest in this measure have given us in this respect much encouragement. There are many eminent persons in Ireland connected with the Church who have shown a great disposition to meet us in the fair field of discussion, to recognize the judgment which has been pronounced at the tribunal of the nation, and to endeavour to arrive at a just and equitable settlement. Nay more, even upon that Episcopal Bench of England, from which oftentimes no sounds but those of persistent resistance have proceeded, there have been signs upon very recent occasions of a sense that it is their duty to look to the future interests of the Church as well as of the Establishment—of the religion as well as of the property with which it is endowed. And those counsels of moderation, which impose on us corresponding obligations, are likely to prevail, as we may hope, in those quarters during the coming discussions. In Ireland it has, indeed, been left only to one single Prelate—the Bishop of Down—among the Episcopal Order boldly to take his stand on behalf of the principle of settlement and accommodation; but yet I cannot but hope and believe that there are many, even among his episcopal brethren, who are by no means disposed to prolong this hopeless struggle or to make demands upon Parliament, as terms of surrender, which it would be impossible for Parliament to grant.

And now, Sir, I think I may say that I will not trouble the Committee further upon general considerations connected with this measure, but will at once proceed to use the best efforts in my power to convey its character and all its leading provisions to the minds of the Committee as nearly as I can in the same light and in the same form as they present themselves to the minds of the Government. And I think, Sir, searching for a key by which I may suggest to the Gentlemen who hear me the best and most likely method of clearly apprehending the nature of the provisions of the Bill which I now hold in my hand, I will venture to direct their attention to the points of time—not, indeed, to all the points of time, because some points of time have of necessity been chosen for secondary and minor purposes—but to the three which I may call essential points of time with reference to which I will endeavour to state the provisions and operation of the Bill so that the Committee may have, as far as depends upon me, a clear understanding of the manner in which we shall endeavour to give effect to the judgment of Parliament and of the country. The first of these points of time, Sir, is the passing of the Act, and I will first describe such of the effects of the Act as are to ensue either immediately upon its passing, or in the provisional and preparatory period which will immediately follow its passing. The second of these points of time is a day named in the Act. At present it stands the 1st of January, 1871, affording an interval between the passing of the Act—should it, as I trust it will, become law during the present Session—of about eighteen months or something less for the preparatory arrangements; but with regard to that day I will presume to say that, while we believe it is distinctly for the interest of the Church itself that this intermediate period should not be too long, and while it is the absolute limit of time which we have thought the best, yet it does not constitute a point of the measure to which, in case the limit is found to be too narrow, we should think ourselves irrevocably pledged. The 1st of January, 1871, therefore, constitutes the second point of time. The third point of time is one which we cannot define as a particular date, but I can describe it by stating the events which will bring it about. It is the point of time at which it shall be decided by the proper authorities that all the subsidiary arrangements connected with the winding up of the Establishment of the Irish Church have been completed, and that thenceforth nothing remains to be done except to apply the property of the Irish Church which will then have discharged every prior claim upon it, and will remain free for the purposes which Parliament may think fit to indicate.

Begging the Committee to bear in mind these three points of time, I will now proceed to describe that portion of the effects of the measure which will follow immediately upon the passing of the Bill. It is provided in almost the earliest clauses that the present Ecclesiastical Commission, which was appointed for the purpose of administering the Church Establishment and not for the purpose of bringing it to an end, shall be wound up. In lieu of it new Commissioners will be appointed, whose names we shall, at a proper time, propose and insert in the Bill. We think very highly of the responsibility of their functions, and are very desirous that the men who may be proposed to discharge those functions should be men to whom Parliament shall have already, for the purposes of the measure, given its general approval. We shall propose that this Commission shall endure for ten years, estimating, as far as present circumstances permit us to do, that this will be a term ample and sufficient for all the numerous and diversified purposes they will have to prosecute. In this Commission, upon the passing of the Bill, the entire property of the Church in Ireland will vest, subject to life interests. The Committee will at once see the importance of that enactment. As far as legal and technical disendowment is concerned, it will have occurred on the day when the measure has received the Royal Assent, because there will no longer remain in the Church of Ireland any title whatever to its property other than that of the Commissioners and other than those temporary titles which we propose that Parliament should recognize. And all the subsequent arrangements which may be found necessary connected with fabrics or with any other points of the question will be technically in the nature of a re-endowment, and will be brought by me separately under your consideration. Then, Sir, next to the vesting of the property I have to mention the provision we propose to make for the government and management of the Church during this intermediate period. Last year we proposed and passed through this House a Bill which suspended every appointment in Ireland from the day of its falling vacant, and we trusted entirely to collateral and subsidiary provisions of the law to make a supply for the time being of such assistance as might be necessary for the actual discharge of duties until Parliament should give its further judgment. Now, Sir, it appears to be plain on the one hand that those provisions which I think were very well adapted to the object we had in view last year of reserving the whole matter for the further judgment of Parliament are not so well adapted to the purpose we now have in view—that is, to apply definitive legislation to the determination of the whole question. On the other hand, it appears to us to be equally indisputable that there is one thing which we could not consistently or properly allow to be done during this intermediate period. We could not properly allow from the passing of the Act the creation of new vested interests for life. We have therefore endeavoured to steer as fairly as we can between these difficulties; on the one side proposing not to be parties to the creation of new vested interests, which I think every one will see would from our point of view be highly inconsistent, and on the other side being equally anxious that the Irish Church, at a period when all its Ministers and members will be called upon to exert themselves to the utmost in preparing for the future, should not be subjected to the disadvantage of a crippled ecclesiastical organization. What we, therefore, propose is, that appointments may be made, generally speaking, to the spiritual offices without investing the person invested with a freehold; that he may receive during the interval the income, as nearly as it can be calculated, which he would have received if he had taken the freehold in the ordinary course, but that his title to it shall terminate when the provisional period is at an end, and when the links which connect the Establishment with the State are finally broken. With respect, in particular, to episcopal appointments, the provision we propose is as follows:—We think it very desirable after once the statute shall have passed for disestablishing the Church to separate the Crown from the exercise of its old Prerogative within the Church. We therefore propose that episcopal appointments may be made by the Crown, but only on the prayer of the Bishops themselves of the provinces of Ireland to consecrate a particular person to a vacancy. Such appointment, if made, will carry with it no vested interest, nor would it carry with it any right of peerage. The Irish Church being engaged in perfecting its organization for the future will probably not run the risk of having its sees and rectories vacant, but will have, so to speak, a staff fully adequate to deal with the coming contingency. With respect to the exercise of Crown patronage as to livings, our view is this, while we take it for granted that, at any rate as a general rule, these livings would be filled up in the interval, they would be filled up on the same footing as bishoprics. In regard to the temporalities, the disposition of the present Advisers of the Crown in making appointments wherever they have by law a right of patronage would be to be guided within the limits of reason by the advice and recommendation of the ecclesiastical authorities. I think that is all I need say as regards the intermediate system that we shall now propose in lieu of the suspensory clauses of the Bill of last year, except that in one point they would correspond more strictly with the provisions of the Bill—namely, in this, that the Commissioners would be inhibited from laying out money for permanent purposes, such as the building of new churches during the interval, and would only be authorized to expend money for the purpose of substantial repairs, for the fulfilment of engagements actually entered into, and for the necessary charges for the performance of Divine worship in the same manner as heretofore. So much for the scheme in relation to suspensory clauses.

ing of the Bill is this. It is well known to the Committee that certain disabilities affect the collective action of the clergy in Ireland, and although the Convocations of England sit and have just been sitting, yet it is not in their power to proceed to either to pass, or even to discuss with a view to passing, any canon or regulation in the nature of a canon without the assent of the Crown. In Ireland the case is different, and more adverse to the action of the Church, for there the Convocation has in point of fact never acted at all, excepting upon some very few occasions which may be specially pointed out, and the latest of those occasions, if I remember right, was a century and a half if not fully two centuries ago. But besides the total disuse of that ecclesiastical machinery and the difficulty in which the Crown is placed when it is called upon to revive or be a party to the revival of that which has never worked at all for 200 years, and with respect to the working rules of which there are, even among lawyers, very grave doubts, there are in Ireland special provisions of the law called the Convention Act, which, though passed for purely political purposes, has the effect of preventing the clergy and laity of the Church from meeting in any general assembly. It is understood, I believe, that the clergy and laity of a parish may meet, but that the Church at large is incapacitated from meeting.

Now, it will, I presume, be deemed on both sides of the House to be obviously just and necessary that all disabilities whatsoever, which in any manner fetter the action of the Church with reference to legislation for the future—and when I speak of legislation I mean private legislation with respect to making voluntary contracts and regulations—ought, in passing a Disestablishment Act, to be at once and entirely swept away. When I say that, let it not be supposed I intend to insinuate any opinion to the effect that such a measure either is likely to cause, or ought to be wished or desired to cause, a religious or spiritual separation between the Church of Ireland and the Church of England. The words of this measure have been carefully considered in reference to the Act of Union, so as to limit, as far as lies in our power, their repealing force to the Establishment of those Churches, and we have been very desirous to do nothing which could possibly be held to interfere with their ecclesiastical relationship. At a later period I shall have to state to the Committee what we have thought it our duty to propose, in order to prevent any kind of shock to their internal condition. But of this I am persuaded, that the best friends of religious union between the Disestablished Church in Ireland and the Established Church in England will be those who most completely assert the liberty of the former to take its own course. Were we to attempt to apply to them constraint even in the faintest and feeblest form for the purpose of seeking to secure their union, we should, I believe, engender re-action, even if such a proceeding were not open to the more palpable and obvious objection that, considering the general scope of our Bill, it would be a proceeding totally and radically unjust. These, I think, are the positive and most important provisions which we propose as provisions which must take effect simultaneously with the passing of the Bill. There is, however, another provision, for the operation of which we cannot precisely fix a time, because it does not depend altogether on us, but which this appears to me to be the proper place to mention. Inasmuch as there must necessarily grow out of the present position of the Church in Ireland, its property and arrangements, a number of measures that in winding up this great system will have to be considered and discussed between some authority on the part of the State and some authority on the part of the Church, the course which we propose to Parliament to take is this—We presume that during the interval which the Bill will create after the disabilities are removed the Bishops, clergy, and laity of the Church of Ireland will proceed to constitute for themselves, in the same manner as other religious communions have done, something in the nature of a governing body. We therefore take by this measure power to Her Majesty in Council—not to create such a body, but to recognize it when created, and we seek to avoid making Her Majesty the judge, either directly or by implication, whether this body is or is not for all purposes created wisely and well. But in the enacting words of the Bill we should direct the attention of the Crown solely to one point—that it must be a representative body, representative alike of the Bishops, clergy, and laity. In point of fact, Her Majesty's Advisers would have to act simply as a jury, and to satisfy themselves that this body so constituted, according to the will and judgment of the Church, fulfilled in good faith the character of a representative body. Her Majesty would then recognize that body as such, and it would become incorporated under the provisions of the Act for the purposes which I shall have presently to describe.

Now, the Committee will see how far we have got. We have passed our provisions through the intermediate period, and we are coming to the day fixed in the Act for the principal and final provisions of the Bill to take effect. We have got in operation a Commission which is to be the organ of the State in giving effect to the whole of our arrangements, and we have given time and every facility which properly belongs to us, not for bringing into operation, but for permitting to come into operation, that organ which we presume the members of the Church of Ireland will appoint in order to transact their share of the complicated business which will remain to be transacted.

I now come to the second and most important period of time which stands at present fixed in the Bill as the 1st of January, 1871. On that day, according to the provisions of the Bill, the union created by Act of Parliament between the Churches of England and Ireland would be dissolved, and "the said Church of Ireland hereafter referred to as 'the said Church'"—I am now quoting the Bill—would cease to be established by law. There would be at the same time a saving clause in the Bill to prevent its having any effect on the Act of Union other than that which is thus strictly limited and defined. On that day the Ecclesiastical Courts in Ireland would be abolished; the ecclesiastical jurisdiction in Ireland would cease; the ecclesiastical laws in Ireland would no longer bind by any authority as law; the rights of peerage would lapse on the part of the Bishops, and all ecclesiastical corporations in that country would be dissolved. The Committee is well aware that the Church itself is not a corporation, but an aggregate of corporations. I am, I believe, strictly accurate in saying that with these provisions in operation on the 1st of January, 1871, the work of the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be legally completed. There is, at the same time, a point of great importance, which I think this is the place for me to mention. Though we feel it to be a necessary—and it will, I think, be admitted by the House generally to be a necessary—part of such a plan as this that it should at once put an end to the force and authority of ecclesiastical laws, as such, in Ireland, yet we also feel that it is our duty not unnecessarily to subject that religious communion now called the Irish Established Church to shocks and inconveniences with respect to the management of its internal affairs not required by the scope of our measure. In point of fact it is not our desire that this transition—this great political transition—should be attended with the maximum, but rather with the minimum of ecclesiastical change. Whatever ecclesiastical change is made, ought, in our opinion, to be the result of the free deliberate will of the members of the Established Church, and not of the shock inconsiderately imparted by crude legislation to its machinery. We therefore propose that although the ecclesiastical laws shall lose their force as laws, in which respect they have a certain relation to the whole community, yet they shall be understood to subsist as a form of voluntary contract, which shall continue to bind together the Bishops, clergy, and laity now constituting the Established Church until and unless they shall be altered by the voluntary agency of the governing body which the members of that communion may appoint. In this way it appears to us that this great launch—and great launch it undoubtedly is, so far as all the ecclesiastical arrangements, properly so called, are concerned—will be effected smoothly, and I am, indeed, very conscious that it is desirable, on every ground that it should be so, for there will be quite enough to tax the energy, the prudence, and the courage of the members of the Church of Ireland in making provision for the great change which we are going to bring about in its internal affairs. The Committee, having followed me thus far, will have perceived that we have complete technical disendowment on the passing of the Act, and complete and actual disestablishment on the day to be named in the Act, and now standing for the 1st of January, 1871.

Next comes a matter on which I fear

it will be my duty to detain the Committee for some time—the task of carrying out all those special arrangements by means of which the interests of the parties affected by this great change will have to be settled and adjusted in detail. I am afraid I should, perhaps, alarm the Committee were I to state how numerous those arrangements are, but they embrace the vested interests of incumbents—and by the word “incumbent” I wish to be understood as meaning a Bishop or a dignitary of the Church, as well as a clergyman having parochial charge—the vested interests of curates, the case of lay and minor offices, the compensation for advowsons, the provisions to be adopted with respect to private endowments, the provisions with respect to churches, with respect to glebe houses, grave-yards, all of those, of course, being subject to the life interests recognized by the Bill. There are the arrangements connected with the winding-up of the Regium Donum, the arrangements connected with the winding-up of Maynooth, the arrangements for disposing of the tithe commutation rent-charge, the arrangements with respect to the large class of property affected by the property-purchase clauses, and the arrangements connected with the sale of the Church lands by the Commissioners. Let me say a word first with respect to that which is the largest of all these subjects—namely, the case of the vested interest of incumbents. Now, the vested interest of the incumbent is quite distinct, on the one hand, from his expectation of promotion. In all cases of the abolition of Establishments, be they civil or ecclesiastical, I am afraid that expectation is a matter into which, however legitimate it may be, it is impossible for us to enter. The vested interest of the incumbent, then, is this—it is a title to receive a certain net income from the property of the Church. I say from the property of the Church, because I set apart receipts from pew rents, receipts from fees, receipts from other casual sources with which it is no business of ours to deal. The vested interest with which we have to deal is the right of the incumbent to be secured in the receipt of a certain annual income from the property of the Church in consideration of the discharge of certain duties to which he is bound as the equivalent he gives for that income, and subject to the laws by which he is bound and the religious body to which he belongs. Therefore the Committee will see in what sense it is true that, although the Church at large and the congregations at large have no vested interests, and it would be impossible to recognize anything of the kind, yet both the Church and the congregations are very largely concerned in the vested interest of the incumbent, because his title is not a simple, unconditional title to a certain payment of money, but it is a title to a payment of money in consideration of duty. In the performance of that duty the congregations and the Church are deeply concerned, and I think it will be the opinion of the Committee that it would be unjust to them to expose them to unnecessary disparagement by worsening the conditions under which they now stand in reference to the clergy. Such is the vested interest of the clergy; and I may here say that although, as a rule, it is for parents to set examples to children, yet, in the vicissitudes of human affairs, it sometimes happens that children may set a good example to parents. It has happened so in this instance, for the Legislature of Canada, having to deal with a case undoubtedly far more simple, far less difficult and complicated than ours, yet notwithstanding, in this one central and vital subject—the manner of dealing with the vested interests of the clergy upon whose incomes it was legislating, and the permanent source of whose incomes it was entirely cutting off—has undoubtedly proceeded upon principles which appear to balance, or rather to maintain very fairly the balance established between, the separate interests of the clergy and the general interests of the Church to which they belong, and the congregations to which they minister. Substantially, and after allowing for necessary differences of expression, we think the basis afforded by the Canadian measure supplies us with no unsuitable pattern after which to shape our own proceedings. Such being the case, I will briefly describe to the Committee how we propose to deal with the vested interest of the incumbent. The plan will be this—The amount of income to which each incumbent is entitled will be ascertained. It will be made subject to deduction for the curates he may have employed. That I will further explain when I come to the curate. It will be made payable, in the case of each, so long as he discharges the duty. And then there will be a provision that the annuity itself may be commuted upon the basis of capitalizing it as an annuity for life. Therefore, the commutation, taking the rate of interest at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, will represent his whole interest in the income he receives, presuming it to last for life. This commutation can only be made upon the application of the incumbent. He must be the prime mover in bringing it about. Upon his application the sum of money will be paid to that which I shall call, for shortness, the Church body, but it will be paid to the Church body subject to the legal trust of discharging the obligation or covenant which we had ourselves to discharge to the incumbent—namely, to give him the annuity in full so long as he discharged the duties. The effect of that plan of commutation will be that, by means of the Church body, and of the inducements that will be given to arrangements between the Church body and the incumbents, we, the State, should escape, as we hope and believe, at a very early period from that which it is undoubtedly not desirable to maintain longer than is absolutely necessary—namely, a direct relation of administrator and recipient between the organs of the State and the individual clergy of the Church. That is the nature of the interest which the State possesses in commutation; and, although, undoubtedly, commutation would be an arrangement so far favourable to the Church collectively—and the very same thing will apply totidem verbis to the Presbyterians of Ireland—as enabling the Church body and the individual to adjust their relations and to make a more economical application of their resources than would be possible by the maintenance of the original annuities, yet the interest of the State in bringing these transactions to a close will be felt amply to justify and strongly to recommend some arrangement of the kind. Well, that is the mode in which we should propose to proceed with respect to the great subject of life interests. These life interests are in truth by far the greatest—and, indeed, much greater than all the rest put together—of the demands upon the fund of the Church before it becomes free and available for other purposes. I wish, however, to explain what I have not yet

stated—that the recognition of life interests, which would be conditional as regards the performance of the duties that are now the equivalent for the income, would be unconditional in other respects. We should not attempt to interfere, in the main, with the position of the clergyman either as proprietor or occupier of land. In many cases, indeed, as we know, the clergy of Ireland do farm their own glebes. In many cases they let land from year to year. In many cases the land is let upon short leases; and although it would be desirable if we could to bring the clergy to give up the position of landlord as soon as possible, we do not propose to effect this result by any forcible or compulsory enactment. Commutation, we think, will offer inducements which will be sufficient for the purpose; but, speaking generally, we do not propose by any compulsory provision in the Bill to interfere with the position of the clergyman in relation to any part of his freehold. There is, however, one exception which I must mention, because it is an exception which, perhaps, has a name and a bulk, though insignificant in every other respect. It is the tithe commutation rent-charge. We propose that the tithe commutation rent-charge shall at once and absolutely, and without any intervening life interest, vest in the Commission under the Act, and the reason is that the tithe commutation rent-charge, with the single exception of a certain amount of fluctuation, which, of course, is rather in the nature of an inconvenience than a convenience to the clergyman, is in every other respect a fixed interest; and inasmuch as it is very desirable immediately to put in action certain arrangements respecting it, we propose to take it at once into the hands of the Commissioners, the faith of Parliament, of course, being pledged to the payment of the whole proceeds which the clergyman could derive from it. Besides that, there is another very small exception which we have thought fit to make. I will speak by-and-by of the case of churches which are in use, but there are in Ireland cases of churches wholly ruinous, many in graveyards, but many apart from graveyards. In some cases the freehold may be in the incumbent of the parish. We propose at once to dispossess him of that freehold. It may be desirable that these sites should be disposed of, either by throwing them into the burial-grounds, or in some other manner; but there can be no advantage in keeping up that barren freehold, which is totally unproductive of practical results to the clergyman, and is purely incidental to his position as clergyman of a Church established by law. There is another change which would be made immediately upon the disestablishment of the Church, and which it is my duty to bring specially to the notice of the Committee, although probably the view of the Committee will be not only in favour of the change, but is likely to be that under the circumstances of the case it is inevitable. The Committee is aware of the peculiar nature of the title of an Irish Bishop to sit in the House of Lords. He has a title to sit there for life, and yet it is an intermittent title. He is not a permanent Member of that Assembly; but he is placed in a certain legal rotation, which brings him there for a Session and then dismisses him, in the case of the Archbishop for one, and in the case of the Bishops for two or three Sessions. We have had to ask ourselves whether it is desirable that a right of Peerage so singular in its character and operation should continue after the disestablishment of the Church? I own that, especially as to my own feelings, it is not without some regret and pain that I propose a provision which should seem in the slightest degree to convey a slight or disparagement in point of dignity to individuals who, as such, I believe to be fully and amply worthy of the honours they enjoy in the House of Lords. But the anomaly is so great, and then, again, it is so obvious, that the Irish Bishops are maintained in the House of Lords for the very purpose of representing a national and an Established Church, that—although not without regret, as far as the individuals are concerned—I think we cannot hesitate to propose to the Committee that these Peerages should lapse with the disestablishment of the Church. It is because this proposal forms a qualification to the broad principle I have laid down, as to respecting life interests in their integrity that I have been so particular in calling attention to it.

Well, now, Sir, I come to the case of the curates, and I hope the Committee will not be shocked at my endeavouring to state clearly the nature of the provisions we propose with regard to this most meritorious class of men, because, wearisome as it must necessarily be to you to pass through such a wilderness of details, yet there are many hundreds of persons for whom this question may be, or at least is believed by them to be, a matter of life or death, and who wait with the keenest anxiety to know the view that has been taken of their case. In speaking of the case of curates, I do not speak simply of those clergymen who have entered into transitory and fluctuating engagements for a week, month, or other short period. I speak of those who are regularly enlisted in the service of the Church as curates, and, in point of fact, are bound to that office by a long life tenure, unless, as they hope may at some time happen, they should be presented to benefices. I speak of those who in a popular sense I may venture to call the permanent curates of the Irish Church. Now, there is a great deal of difficulty to be encountered in dealing with this class of persons; but the Committee will observe that I am not now asking them to invade the public or the national fund for the purpose of compensation. In the main I am only studying to secure the due application to the benefit of the curate of those deductions which we have already made from the income of the incumbent, when proceeding to calculate his annuity for the purpose of ascertaining his vested interest. We propose, then, to deal with the curates as follows:—The Commissioners are to determine who are the curates permanently employed. In some cases the form of the instrument under which they are employed will adequately determine this point; but in others it would not. We propose to leave the matter to the Commissioners, giving also to the incumbent the power of objecting that A. B., his curate, was not permanently employed. It is required, also, in order to enable the curate to take advantage of the provision on this point, that he should have been employed on the 1st of January, 1869, and that he continue to be employed on the 1st of January, 1871; or that, if he has ceased to be employed, the discontinuance of his employment shall be due to some cause other than his own free choice or misconduct. That will be the test of the eligibility of the curate. Being so eligible, he would, primâ facie, be entitled to have the interest in his curacy calculated for life, he would have a vested interest in it in the same way as the incumbent has in the income of his living or bishopric, and he would be entitled to have it commuted upon the same terms. He would also be subjected to the corresponding obligation to that which would be imposed on the incumbent—that is to say, he would be bound to continue the duties he now performs until he effects an arrangement for commutation; he would be bound to render the same services to the incumbent that he formerly did, or if he cease to render them, in order to maintain his qualification, that cessation must be due to some other cause than his own misconduct or free choice. With regard to the curates of a more transitory class, we have a provision in the Bill which appears to us a fair analogy to a similar provision in the Civil Service Superannuation Acts, according to which gratuities may be awarded in consequence of disadvantages they may have sustained. But that is a matter of minor importance and minute detail upon which I will not at present detain the Committee.

I come now to the arrangements I shall have to make with regard to private endowments—and here it would be as well to refer to a misunderstanding, by no means immaterial, that sprung up in the course of last Session in consequence of an expression used by me. I said, in the course of discussion on the Irish Church, that not less than three-fifths, as far as I could reckon, of the whole money value of the property of the Church would be given back to the Church itself or to its members in any form of disestablishment that Parliament would probably agree to. It was not generally observed how important a part of that statement were the words “or its members,” which I pronounced with some emphasis. What the Church will receive, under the plan of the Government, I will endeavour to separate from what its members will receive; no doubt its members will receive compensation, and the congregations of the Church have a very real interest, if not a vested interest, in those compensations. But with regard to the Church itself, the proposal of the Government would be to convey to it nothing in the shape of what I may call marketable property—I will by-and-by

explain what I mean by that phrase—with the exception of private endowments which it may have received. I beg the Committee not to come prematurely to a conclusion as to the meaning of those words; but I think I shall be able to make them good, and to explain them in the course of what I am now going to say. With respect to these private endowments we do not propose that the enactments relating to them should embrace churches or glebe houses, because these are dealt with on grounds of their own, which take them out of this category. But there are private endowments in the Irish Church; and although they do not appear to be very large in amount, they are various in form—such as endowments in glebe lands, in tithes, and in money. And the definition of private endowments we think it fair to take is this—In the first place, it must be money which has been contributed from private sources. It may have been given in a public character, as for example in the cases of Primate Boulter and Primate Robinson; but though given by persons holding a public position, its having been given in a private capacity evidently constitutes it a private endowment. But we limit it by date, and the date we have chosen to propose to Parliament for limitation is the year 1660—the year of the Restoration. The reason that has recommended the date to us is the fact that the Restoration was really the period at which the Church of Ireland—the Reformed or Protestant Church of Ireland—assumed its present legislative shape and character. Before the wars of Charles I., in all the free Churches of the Three Kingdoms there were more or less the different elements that finally developed themselves into different forms of Protestantism, and these were in conflict together within the bosom of the National Church. In England we had Puritanism and Anglicanism struggling for ascendancy within the pale of the Church, as we are told in Scripture that Jacob and Esau struggled together within the womb of their mother. In Scotland there was the same struggle, with the exception that there Presbyterianism was really in the ascendancy. In Ireland, in the same way, Presbyterianism and Episcopacy were struggling powerfully together during the reigns of James I. and Charles I. It may not be known to all who hear me—though it ought to be known, and it tends strongly to justify us in not going beyond the Restoration — that the very confession, the doctrinal Confession of the Irish Church in the reign of James I. and Charles I. was not the same as that in England. It was modelled by Archbishop Usher upon the highest Calvinistic frame, and it included nine Articles, which composed a document well known in England under the name of the Lambeth Articles drawn up in the latter end of the sixteenth century. I hope I shall not wound the feelings of any man when I say that it was undoubtedly one of the most formidable collections of theology which ever proceeded from the pen of a Divine in the whole history of Christendom. It was different in spirit to the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, and the constitution of the Irish Church was practically different. Presbyterianism, I know, was not formally or legally recognized then; but it had a real or practical recognition in Ulster, which was occupied by Scotch rather than English colonists, who were for the most part Presbyterians. I find no proof that when a Presbyterian minister went over from Scotland to Ireland he was obliged to submit to re-ordination; and if a Bishop had to go into a place where ordination was going on he was never allowed, as far as I can learn, in the case of a man of strong Presbyterian opinions, to assert his episcopal character and his exclusive power of ordination, but had to beg for admission into the room where the ordination was going on. Even if we could trace the private endowments back to so remote a period, the first effect would be to raise a strong controversy between the friends of Presbytery and Episcopacy. When we come to the time of Charles II., at which period the ecclesiastical condition both of England and Ireland became perfectly distinct—we ask you, then, to distinguish between private and public endowments, because we know historically that a man, at any rate, knew what he was doing, and the fair presumption arises that if he gave his money to the Church it was for the support of that form of religion to which it is now applied. That will be the definition we propose to take with respect to private endowments. They are not numerous in the Church of Ireland, but they are of extraordinary interest. Take the case of the parish of Laracor, the parish of which Dean Swift was vicar before he was transferred to the Deanery of St. Patrick's. When he went into it Laracor had a glebe house and one acre. He left it with a glebe house and twenty acres. He improved and decorated it in many ways. It is sad and melancholy to learn—if only we look upon this place as one of the memorials of so extraordinary a man—that many of the embellishments, or what our Scotch friends would call “amenities,” of the glebe which grew up under his fostering hand have since been effaced. He endowed the vicarage with certain tithes which he had purchased for the purpose; and I doubt whether it is generally very well known that a curious question arises on this bequest, because a portion of his property—by-the-by, consisting, I believe, of those very tithes—was left by him for what he calls—I never knew the term to be used elsewhere—“the Episcopal religion then established in Ireland.” But that extraordinary man, even at the time when he wrote that the Irish Catholics were so down-trodden and insignificant that no possible change could ever bring them into a position of importance, appears to have foreseen the day when the ecclesiastical arrangements of Ireland would be brought under a strict scrutiny and reckoning; because, not satisfied with leaving the property to maintain the Episcopal religion he proceeds to provide for the day when that Episcopal religion might be disestablished and be no longer the national religion of the country. Apparently by some secret intimation, he foresaw the shortness of its existence as an Establishment, for he left the property subject to a condition that in such case it should be administered for the benefit of the poor. The value of the private endowments, as far as we have been able to ascertain, is not more than £500,000 between land tithes and money. It is very uncertain. I may say here that I think the Committee will recognize the fairness of a step which we propose to take. There may be a good deal of legal research and legal expenditure requisite in order to obtain evidence upon those titles. We propose therefore to authorize the Commissioners to allow the parties reasonable expenses in cases where they think those expenses have been fairly undertaken in ascertaining the title and establishing the fact of private endowments.

I now come to the churches. This is the way in which we propose to deal with churches—when I say churches, I mean principally—indeed, I may say exclusively—churches which are in use by the present Established Church. Now, it is quite evident that churches cost a great deal of money to erect, but that when erected they do not properly fall within the category of “marketable property.” Buyers will not easily be found, and in Ireland, as far as I can understand, there is no great insufficiency of churches—in the Establishment there is a profusion—among the Presbyterians or the Roman Catholics. Be that as it may—whether founded on feeling or the inconvertibility of churches into marketable property—we have no doubt whatever that, subject always to the general though not legal obligation of applying them to religious purposes, we propose that the churches of Ireland should be handed over to the governing body of the Disestablished Church with as little difficulty, impediment, or embarrassment as possible. What we propose, therefore, is, that within the trust those churches may be taken on the simple declaration of that body that it is their intention to take and maintain them for the purposes of worship, or else to take them down, which they wish to do in certain cases, where it is expedient for the purpose of substituting for them new churches, which the governing body may desire to build, and which may be more convenient, especially having reference to the altered temporal circumstances of their community. Under these circumstances, I have no doubt a great number of these churches will be taken over by the governing body of the Disestablished Church; but, whether that be so or not, it is our duty to make provision for the accidental case of churches being refused. If churches be not taken over by the governing body, we are not led to think that it would be expedient for Parliament to contemplate their actual transfer, under operation of law, to any other religious community; nor are we led to believe that would be generally desired by any other party. We, therefore, take a general power to enable the Commissioners to dispose of the site, or of the building itself, or, more properly, its materials.

Now there is a case on which I should say a few words, because I think it is one in which equity requires or recommends that we should make a small allowance from the ecclesiastical fund to the Disestablished Church. Unhappily, in Ireland there are not copiously scattered, as in England, churches which are beautiful and wonderful specimens of art, and which form one of the richest portions of our national treasury; but here and there in Ireland there are churches of that class. I need only mention one which has been before the public in a peculiar manner of late years—the Church of St. Patrick in Dublin. We cannot but admit these two propositions—In the first place, that it is desirable that such churches should be maintained—that it would not be desirable for the credit or character of the country that they should fall into decay; and the second proposition is that the maintenance of such fabrics is more than we have a right to expect by means of casual voluntary contributions. If such a congregation, founded on voluntary basis, should think to erect for itself such a church as St. Patrick’s or Westminster Abbey, it will be for them to be responsible for its maintenance; but, with respect to those fabrics which have been erected and have been held under the expectation of permanent maintenance, we propose—subject to very careful limitations, for we confine the number to twelve churches—that the Commissioners should be authorized, where it is desirable, that a church should be maintained as a national monument, and where it is found that the maintenance would be too heavy for a voluntary congregation, to allow a moderate sum for its maintenance to those to whom it is given up. This is not a very large provision, but it is one recommended by the distinct equity of the case. I will say one word with regard to churches which are not in use in Ireland. Some of these national monuments are of a curious and interesting character; but, at the same time, as in the case of the churches at Glendalough, they are not suited or adapted to public worship. Therefore, we propose that such churches should be handed over to the Board of Works, with an allocation of funds sufficient for their due and becoming preservation. In other cases where there are remains of churches and sites of churches they might form burial grounds, or be taken up and restored by one of the religious communities of the country. Though their value may be insignificant, we ask Parliament to give power to the Commissioners to dispose of them to those communities.

The next question, I am sorry to say, like that of the curates, is beset with complications. It is one which was before the public last year, and with respect to it my views are very much qualified, or, indeed, I may say, almost overturned by the state of facts that since then we have become more accurately acquainted with. It is the case of the glebe houses; and I wish when I speak of them to include the see houses, as I included the Bishops when I spoke of the incumbents, because, in all essential respects, they stand on the same footing. With respect to the glebe houses it is exceedingly difficult to analyze the sources from which the means of building them have proceeded. Parliamentary grants have had a share of it, and private endowments have had a share of it; but the greater part of those funds has hitherto been supplied by charges deducted from the incomes of the clergy under Acts of Parliament, enabling them to charge their successors as well as themselves. Now, a nice and knotty question arises, as to whether money so obtained is to be regarded as a public or a private endowment. I can imagine a whole night spent in the discussion of that point. The greatest difficulties have arisen upon this point, and I myself have inclined sometimes one way and sometimes another with reference to it. As, in the case of the churches, there are some men of a practical turn of mind, not perhaps open much on the side of their imagination, whose minds were materially influenced by the observation that churches were not a marketable property, so the same feeling obtains as a general rule with respect to glebe houses, the value of which, while immense to the body that may possess the churches, is very small indeed to any other persons. How correct I am in making this statement the Committee will be enabled to judge when I inform them that we can trace an expenditure upon glebe houses—not including sites—amounting to £1,200,000, and yet the whole of the present value of them in Ireland, including the ground upon which they are built, is estimated at only £18,600 per annum. [Murmurs from below the gangway on the Ministerial side.] I hear a good deal of murmuring from some quarters of the House, and I am not surprised at it, because when these facts first came to my knowledge I was astonished myself. [An hon. MEMBER inquired whether the sum mentioned included the value of the glebes?] No, if I wanted to confuse the matter thoroughly, I should merely have to discuss the subjects of the glebe houses and the glebes together. I have alluded to this point because I desire to draw a distinction between the title of the Church to what may be looked upon as property, because it can be converted into a sensible amount of money, and its title to that which, however valuable to it as a body, has no marketable value. However, I, by no means, wish to be understood as saying that the glebe houses of Ireland are worth nothing. On the contrary, I will prove to the House that they are not worth nothing, and I will do so by showing that we shall not get hold of them without paying for them, as, unfortunately they are saddled with heavy building charges. It is a singular fact that upon these glebe houses, which are valued at the present moment at £18,600 per annum—perhaps you may be justified in adding 20 per cent to that amount in order to bring the value up to the rack rental—there should be, in addition to the enormous sums already laid out upon them, a building charge outstanding of about £250,000. That is the exact state of the case, and I cannot put it too pointedly to the Committee. £1,200,000 has been already laid out upon this property, of which the annual value according to the Tenements Valuation amounts to £18,600, and a further sum of £250,000 is still payable upon it on account of a building charge—a sum which must be paid in order to enable us to come into legal possession of it. Now, that is not certainly a very inviting prospect. I confess I was greatly astonished when I found that property which last year I proposed to treat as convertible property of very considerable value turned out to have this large charge upon it and to be of such comparatively small marketable value. However, such as it is, we of course propose to take it. If the statement I have made prove to be inaccurate and should it turn out that the glebe houses are of more value than I am now stating them to be, what I am now about to say will be subject, of course, to re-consideration. Assuming, however, that my information is correct with reference to the value of this property, then it appears to me, and it has also appeared to the Government, that the best course we can adopt under the circumstances is this—This building charge, which will have to be paid by us in the first instance, is not uniformly distributed over the whole of the glebe houses. It is probable that in some cases it will amount to almost their full marketable value, while in others no building charge at all will have to be paid. The necessity of paying the building charge where it exists is binding upon us, because in such a case the incumbent would have been entitled to recover it from his successor; and, consequently, when the incumbent dies or commutes under the provisions of this Bill, either he or his family will be entitled to recover it from us as standing in the place of his successor. We are, therefore, bound by law and by justice to discharge this obligation, and we are not called upon to exercise any discretion in the matter. We shall come into possession of the glebe houses when the existing life interests are exhausted, because our interest will still be only in the nature of a reversionary interest in the property, and then we shall have to pay the amount of the building charge still outstanding at the time. Having come into possession of the property upon those terms, we shall assume that the glebe house, where fully charged, is no property at all, but we shall still regard the land upon which it stands as valuable property. We shall say to the Church body that, wherever you take the church, you may negotiate for the land on which the glebe house is built, which we will sell at a fair valuation; and, further, that they may negotiate for a small glebe, not exceeding ten acres in extent, of the adjacent glebe land, at a fair and reasonable valuation. And so we propose to deal with the land. Where you take the land you may take the house, but with the building charge, and subject to that limitation that it should not exceed ten years' tenant valuation put upon the house, together with the site, which is as much as can be fairly expected to be paid for glebe houses. These houses will be subjected to no distinct charge where the building charge does not exist; but where we have to pay a building charge, we shall endeavour to recover it before giving up the property of the governing body of the Disestablished Church. I have certainly had to make a very complex statement, and I do not know if you understand it. It is, however, a matter of great importance, and, after a great deal of consideration, Her Majesty's Government have arrived at the conclusion that it is the best mode of dealing with this part of the subject. The great value of these glebe houses is entirely visionary. It has been said that facilities ought to be given, although not in the way of grants of money, to the members of other communions, for the purpose of enabling them to erect glebe houses for themselves. Now, that is a principle which has been already adopted by Parliament in the case of the Act of William IV. under which public money was advanced—under somewhat onerous conditions it is true—to the Roman Catholics and the Presbyterians of Ireland for the purpose of building glebe houses. Although we have not inserted any clause to carry out such a proposal in the present Bill we think it may be desirable that loans for this purpose may be granted upon easy terms contemporaneously with the winding-up arrangements to be conducted by the Ecclesiastical Commission. At the same time it will be necessary to limit the operation of that system within a certain period of time, because I think it is open to considerable doubt whether it would be desirable to keep a law of that kind permanently upon the Statute-book, seeing that it might possibly lead to some controversy in Ireland.

The question relating to the burial-grounds may be disposed of very shortly. I propose that the burial-grounds belonging to a church shall pass along with it to the Church body holding the latter, provision, however, being made in all cases for the preservation of existing interests in the burial-ground. It is known to the Committee that the law in Ireland, as recently adjusted with respect to burying-grounds, is very different from, and is much more favourable to the public, than that in force in England. We propose that all other burial-grounds shall be given over to the Guardians of the Poor, and we propose to give uniformity and simplicity to the provisions of the law which is now in partial action. I think I have now done with the winding-up arrangements of the Bill as far as the Established Church is concerned. There still remains a portion of them which, although not very extensive in amount, yet is of very great importance, and one which, I am bound to add, is by no means free in all its bearing from difficulty. It was at all times part of the views of those who proposed the Resolutions of last year that with the disestablishment of the Church must come the final cessation of all relations between the State and the Presbyterian clergy in Ireland and between the State and the College of Maynooth.

I have now to consider in what manner effect is to be given to that conviction, which was strongly entertained by the House, and which was, in fact, embodied in a fourth Resolution passed by the House during the Session of 1868, which was added to the other three Resolutions which had been previously agreed to. The sum which we have now to deal with is an annual sum of about £70,000. Of that amount £26,000 a year constitutes the Vote for Maynooth, and between £45,000 and £50,000 is the aggregate of the Votes given for the various communities of Presbyterians. And now, Sir, we are no longer dealing with a simple and single body of religionists, known to the law as the Established Church, but we are dealing with classes which, in point of religious opinion, fall under a three-fold division. The interest now before us is that of the Old or Scotch Presbyterians, as I may call them for distinction's sake; the next is that of the minor bodies of Presbyterians, who are separated in Ireland from the main body, not only by religious communion, but by grave differences in those matters which lie at the foundation of the Christian faith. There are three or four of these bodies, such as the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster, the Presbytery of Antrim, and one or two more, who fall under a different class of religionists; these, or some of them, entertaining Arian, or what are called Unitarian opinions. Then there are the Roman Catholics, sufficiently known to us to dispense with the necessity for any description as regards their religious opinions. If I refer to these distinctions of religious belief it is only for the purpose of stating in the broadest manner, that, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, I entirely decline, on the present occasion, to enter into such matters. I will not for one moment ask what are the political or the religious peculiarities of these bodies, professing the Christian name, with whom we are to deal; but I will endeavour to deal with them strictly, impartially, and equitably—on the principle of civil justice, which apply to them all alike, and which render it iniquitous and wrong to raise controversial questions in regard to them, or to matters of religious belief. The ground they stand on is that of citizenship—the claim they urge is that of general equity and good faith. We, the Government, have recognized that claim. I am confident that Parliament will recognize that claim in the case of the Established Church. Let us endeavour to proceed upon the same fair, and just, and liberal, though moderate and prudent recognition of it in the case of these bodies exterior to the Established Church. Now, as respects the larger part of this sum of £70,000 a year, there is no difficulty—when you come to look at it in the light of a purely civil interest. Most of it is given in the shape of a direct Vote of so much money passing immediately from the State to the individual through the Synod, but in all cases the nature of the vested interest and expectancy—call it what you like—is the same. All we have to do is to take precisely the same course as with respect to the clergy of the Established Church. Take the question of income—which here being a mere matter of money can be at once ascertained—that is not given to him for nothing, but on the condition of the performance of duty. Hence, with a slight modification, which I need not here mention, a similar claim will arise in the case of the Presbyterian minister to that which I have already explained in the case of the incumbent; and the Bill also will give to him a power of commutation in every substantial respect corresponding with that proposed to be made for the clergy of the Established Church.

So far with respect to the clergy and to life interests proper. Beside the ministers who perform spiritual offices in particular congregations there is another class that appears to us to have a claim; they are what are called assistants and successors. Now these gentlemen are in a condition, not indeed as to the abundance of the interest at which they are ultimately to arrive, but otherwise I take it legally in a condition not very far removed from that of an heir of entail; they are already appointed to the assistant pastorate of a particular congregation; they derive no benefit from the Regium Donum, but the office of assistant which they hold entitles them to succeed after the death or resignation of the incumbent, and consequently it is urged that they have a just claim to the expectancy created by that right of succession. This is not a very large matter, and will present no difficulty; it consists only of the difference in value between the life of the incumbent and the younger life of his successor; but to that extent we think it just that the claim should be provided for. Then there is another class—the teachers of Presbyterian educational institutions under the General Assembly of the Presbytery of Ulster. With regard to them, though they are not ministers, but professors only, we propose to deal with them precisely in the same manner as if they were pastors of churches, and to assure to them their salaries, together with a like power of commutation. But now comes a greater difficulty, with respect to those educational establishments to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee for a few moments. When we disestablish a Church, and when a particular congregation ceases to have a pastor found for it by public funds, it feels an immediate want, and a stimulus is applied to it to satisfy that want. But when you deal with an establishment for educational purposes, a rather different order of considerations comes into play. There are several points which ought to be taken into account, although I will not say precisely what amount of weight is to be given to them. When dealing with Presbyterian education, we are also dealing with the College of Maynooth, and the latter is a subject of difficulty of its own, and in this way we have no feelings with the professions and principles of Maynooth, but with the Presbyterian ministers and professors we have. We know nothing of the details of the arrangements made by the Professors of Maynooth with reference to the expenditure of the public Grants. We have chosen to constitute a trust by the authority of an Act of Parliament, and to that trust we have committed the disposal of the Grant which Parliament has thought fit to make. Well, now, what is the experience of England? The experience, in particular, of the training Colleges proves that there should be some consideration in dealing with establishments for education. I ought not, perhaps, to bring into the present discussion the case of Trinity College, Dublin, for Her Majesty's Government make no proposal upon that subject at the present time. But it is perfectly plain that if the House and the Legislature should adopt the measure that we now submit to it, Trinity College, Dublin, will have to be made the subject of legislation. It is also, I think, quite plain that it will be impossible to maintain the present exclusive application of the revenues of Trinity College to the purposes of a governing body and staff wholly connected with one religious persuasion. It is quite possible that Parliament may apply to Trinity College the same lenient method of dealing which it commonly adopts, and may think fit to leave some moderate provision applicable to the rearing, or to the teaching, at least, of the clergy, who will, as a clergy, become dependent entirely upon the resources of a voluntary communion. But undoubtedly when we come to deal with Trinity College we shall feel the force of this argument, that to put a sharp termination to the career of an educational establishment is a more trenchant operation than to do the same with the machinery for providing a parochial ministry, because one is a much stronger stimulus to persons to provide themselves with clergymen than the other is to induce them to maintain schools in which these clergymen can be trained. These general considerations, at the same time, are considerations which I know must not be pushed beyond their proper limits. I hope the House will think, when I come to the end of this long and wearisome statement, that whatever the Government have done they have endeavoured to keep strict good faith. I believe that I have announced no proposal as yet to which that character will not be held to apply when it is compared with our former declarations; and I trust that my announcements will remain the same to the end of the chapter.

and spirit of our general arrangements, and, subject always to the full maintenance, in letter and in spirit, of that which we have heretofore declared, what appears to us the most equitable method of dealing with the Regium Donum, the Grant to Maynooth, and all similar grants. The Presbyterians are interested in this matter in respect of the College which they have in Belfast, and like wise in respect of a similar institution which exists for the benefit of minor Presbyterian bodies; the Roman Catholics are interested in it, through the College of Maynooth; but there are also several other payments made by Parliament which, on the whole, fall under very much the same class of considerations. There is the payment made by Parliament to what is called the Presbyterian Widows' Fund. Now, that, of course, exists for the purpose of supplying wants that are coming into operation from year to year, and it would be very hard to withdraw that Widows' Fund without notice. In the same way it would be hard to withdraw, without notice, the Grants now made to Presbyterian educational establishments and to the College of Maynooth. There is another class of payments made by the Presbyterians to their Synodical officers. They hold an office regarding which it is very difficult to define the degree to which it should be considered a vested interest. But when we look at the whole of these matters, and read them in the light of the declaration and proceedings of last year, we have adopted—first, the principle that no permanent endowment can be given to them out of the public resources properly so called; and, secondly, the principle that no permanent endowment can be given to them out of the national ecclesiastical fund of Ireland. What we propose—and we think it a fair and equitable proposal—is—that in order to give time for the free consideration of the arrangements and the construction of scales for the satisfaction of life interests, and for avoiding violent shocks and disappointments to those whose plans for life may already have been made upon the supposition of the continuance of arrangements which have so long existed, and which were solemnly made, there should be a valuation of the interest of all these grants—a life interest at a moderate scale or at fourteen years' purchase of the capital amount now annually voted. [Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The annual amount?] Yes, the annual amount. It is a life interest, and it is to be commuted as a life interest is commuted, upon the age of the individual. That age varies. In the case of Presbyterian ministers, as there is a large number of years, that amount is high. In the case of Bishops and dignitaries it is somewhat lower. We take fourteen years as, on the whole, a fair amount of these different grants. We propose to treat them substantially as life interests, and the payment is to be analogous to that made on other life interests, and this is to wind up and close all the relations between those bodies and persons and the State.

Well, now, Sir, I am coming in sight of port, but I have not yet done. There are two or three points which will not take long, apart from the question of religion and matters of controversy, but which are of so much interest to gentlemen connected with Ireland and the land of Ireland, and which likewise have so innocent and beneficial a bearing on the land question of Ireland, that I must beg for a little more of the indulgence of the Committee. First of all, I would proceed to explain what I fear some of my hearers will think ought to be placed in the category of financial puzzles. If they do not entirely follow me I will ask them, without understanding me, to believe it, and I will undertake to make it good upon a future occasion. It relates to the important subject of the tithe rent-charge of Ireland. I have already said that I attach great importance to the merging of the tithe rent-charge, and for that reason the Commission will step into the possession of it immediately after the passing of the Act. Well, if there be here any hon. Gentlemen possessed of land in Ireland—and there are many—they will not be very grateful to me for what I am going first to state. It is that we shall give to them unconditionally the tithe rent-charge at twenty-two and a half years' purchase. That is, of course, twenty-two and a half years' purchase, not of the old gross £100, but of the £75 a year. We make that offer because we think there may be landlords in Ireland who will be disposed at once to wind-up the arrangement with us. But if Gentlemen will listen to me they will see that we have its possession. Such a Commission is not, and cannot be permanently a good landlord, and it is far better that it should discharge itself, as soon as may be, of duties it cannot properly fulfil. What we propose, then, is that in selling the proprietary rights of these estates the power of pre-emption should be provided for the tenants, and, what is more—indeed, without this addition I do not think I could claim for this provision credit for anything more than good intentions—we further propose that in such sales three-fourths of the purchase-money may be left upon the security of the land, and that the charge so remaining shall be liquidated by instalments, upon the principle adopted in the Drainage Act, by which we make the whole re-payable in twenty-two years. Now, the nature of this proposal the Committee thoroughly comprehend, and I trust it will meet with their approval. It does not place the land in the market in an anomalous character; it does not make the State responsible for duties that it cannot fulfil, and the permanent retention of which is alien from its nature. And it will have the economical effect of materially improving the price that we shall get for the land; and by this means we shall try the experiment, on a limited scale, of breaking up properties in a manner which I believe to be perfectly safe, perfectly easy, and perfectly unexceptionable.

I will now, Sir, give to the Committee the financial result of these operations in a very few words. With respect to the income of the Irish Church I shall say very little, for I have great difficulty in making out what it really is. The Church Commission laboured assiduously between 1867 and the end of 1868, and they have reported, as the result of their inquiries, that the income of the Irish Church is £616,000 a year. I must say, with very great respect for their sixteen months of toil, that I humbly dissent from the conclusion at which the Commission arrived. It seems to me that they placed the revenue too low. I find that one of the Commissioners (Colonel Adair), who is known to have taken an active part in their labours, has within the last fortnight published a statement in which he puts the income of the Irish Church as high as £839,000 a year. I do not place it quite so high as Colonel Adair, nor quite so low as the Irish Church Commission. I believe it to be about £700,000 a year, which I think is no unfair statement. So much for the income of the Irish Church. But what we have more to do with is the capital. I have taken the tithe rent-charge at the rate of purchase I propose, and I find that the tithe rent-charge will yield £9,000,000. I have taken the land of all kinds, episcopal and chapter lands, those belonging to glebes, &c., and putting on them the fairest valuation that a very competent person by whom we are assisted in Dublin can make, I find that the whole undivided value of the lands and of the perpetuity rents, if sold, would be £6,250,000. Besides that, there is money of one kind or another in stocks and banks to the amount of £750,000. I have not attempted to value the fabrics of churches, nor the fabrics of the glebe houses, because after what I have stated how they stand in the Tenements Valuation, and the charge upon them, I consider it would be idle to include them in this statement as an item of any considerable amount. The result, without taking into account the glebe houses and churches, is that the whole value of the Church property in Ireland, reduced and cut down as it has been—first by the almost unbounded waste of life tenants, and second by the wisdom or un-wisdom of well-intending Parliaments—the remaining value is not less than £16,000,000—an amount more considerable than I had ventured to anticipate, when, with smaller means of information, I endeavoured to form an estimate of it last year.

I now come to a delicate part of the case, and here the figures must be considered as taken with rather a broad margin. Yet, on the whole, I think they will be found very near the mark, so far as the total is concerned. The life interests of incumbents of all kinds in the Church—Bishops, dignitaries, and parochial clergy—will amount, I think to, say £4,900,000; and if that appears to any one a large sum, he should recollect that when divided by the large number of persons—2,000, including curates—among whom the whole has to be apportioned, it represents a very slender acknowledgment for the labours, expectations, and costly education of those gentlemen, and for the anxieties and honest and good service by which their respective situations have been attended.

Mr. Gladstone

The compensation of the curates, deducted almost entirely from that of the incumbents, will come to £800,000. The lay compensations are not inconsiderable. They will come to £900,000. Of that, something over £300,000, it is supposed, will be the value of the advowsons; but it is very difficult in Ireland to obtain fixed, clear, and definite rules for estimating their value. The transfer of them in Ireland is comparatively rare, and they are subject to a variety of contingencies which very much impair the means of judgment. It is not a large matter. We put it at about £300,000. The other lay compensations embrace a class of persons who do not much enter into the view, looking at this subject generally; but the largest part will be absorbed by the parish clerks and sextons in Ireland, of whom the bulk, I believe, like the incumbents, have freehold offices, and must be dealt with on the very same principle as the incumbents. Then there are the officers of cathedrals, of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the functionaries connected with the present Ecclesiastical Commission. These will bring up the amount of the lay compensations to about £900,000. The charge of private endowments on the fund is about £500,000, and in that, I may say, in passing, will not be included the result of a recent Act of Parliament passed by Sir Joseph Napier as to endowments of a particular class, which it is not necessary to bring into this Bill. The building charges we shall have to pay, in order to get possession of the buildings, is £250,000. The sum necessary to clear off our engagements upon the moderate footing we propose with respect to the Presbyterians and Maynooth will be £1,100,000; and of that sum I ought to say two-thirds will go to the Presbyterians, and no more than one-third to Maynooth. I must also supply two small claims I had omitted. The Presbyterians claim—and I think it is not an unreasonable claim—that, as we admit an educational establishment to require a little more time for maintaining it on the old system, we should give them some consideration in the shape of money in respect of the buildings they have raised in Belfast to meet the Parliamentary Grant, which we shall be prepared to concede, subject to the maximum of £15,000. The other is a claim, not made by the Roman Catholics, but it is our opinion it ought to be made spontaneously, and that, I think, will be the universal opinion of the House. When the Act of 1845 was passed it was known to be the intention that the buildings of Maynooth should be kept in repair at the public charge. The House of Commons modified its views shortly after. The College had no means of meeting the necessary expense except by borrowing, and they have gone in debt to the Board of Works to the extent of £20,000. I think we should all feel that that debt incurred in past time on account of these repairs, and in consequence of a change of view on the part of Parliament, ought at once to be remitted. I estimate the expense of this Commission during the ten years of its continuance at £200,000, and that makes my total charge against the property of the Church amount to £8,650,000. So that the property will be divided—for I confess I have some faith in the moderation of my estimate—into two nearly equal parts; or, to be quite safe, I may call it £16,000,000, and as the charges upon it will come to between £8,000,000 and £9,000,000, the sum at the disposal of Parliament for other purposes will not be less than between £7,000,000 and £8,000,000.

I have now, Sir, done with my first and second date. We have arrived at a period, let us suppose, when the arrangements I have detailed are all completed—that is to say, as far completed as the provisions that have been made can possibly require. But there is one financial item which, through infirmity of memory, I have omitted. The Committee will naturally ask how we are to pay the heavy charge that may be compiled by the commutations, because if the commutations are made, and we have every desire they should be made immediately or as soon as possible after disestablishment, they will require, between Episcopalians and Presbyterians, from £6,000,000 to £7,000,000. My answer is that, fortunately, the banking resources of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer are such, with respect to the deposits of the public, as to cause no serious difficulty on that part of the case; and, as a matter of prudence, we have taken power in the Bill to fix the payment of commutation money in eight instalments extending over four years.

rangements which I have so imperfectly detailed, and which the Committee have listened to with so much patience—supposing that we have reached the moment when these arrangements are all completed—that is, so far completed that provision is made for all they can possibly require—I now come to the third date, to which I pointed at the commencement, and I ask a question which will re-awaken the flagging interest of the Committee—How are we to dispose of the residue? I will first state the conditions which appear to me necessary to be combined in a good plan for the disposal of such a fund. The first two are already fixed—written, I may say, in letters of iron. It is written that the money is to be applied to Irish purposes; and it is written that it is to be applied to purposes not ecclesiastical—not for any Church, not for any clergy, not for any teaching of religion, and I hope the Committee will see that, in thus broadly stating what I conceive to be the obligations we have come under, I am showing a disposition not to shrink from the fulfilment of those obligations. But there are other requisites that it is most important to combine in any plan for the application of this residue. In the first place, I think there are feelings much to be respected in a large portion of the community—of those who say that the time has come when the application of this money must be dissociated from the teaching of religion, but who, at the same time, would desire that its future application should, if possible, bear upon it some of those legible marks of Christian character, which would be, as it were, a witness to its first origin and to its long continued use, being applied, as nearly as circumstances admit, in conformity with what is usually the cypres doctrine of Courts of Equity. Another condition of a good plan is that it must not drag us from one controversy into another. We must not make this great controversy, as yet itself not perfectly solved [Opposition Cheers—yes, but very near its perfect solution—the mere doorway to another set of conflicts and disputes, perhaps, equally embarrassing. One condition of a good plan is that, the question being Irish and wholly Irish, the plan must be equal in its application to all parties, and, as far as may be, to the whole community in Ireland. One condition more I will mention, to which I attach the highest value: the plan must embody the final application of the money. The money must be so disposed of, so attached and annexed to the satisfaction of the permanent wants always inherent in the community, that the day never can come when some Member, rising either upon these or upon those Benches can say “Here you have a fine fund undisposed of in Ireland,” and may suggest some scheme of applying it which shall lead us back into all the embarrassments from which we are now at length vigorously struggling to free ourselves.

I will mention some of the modes suggested for the application of the money. The division of the fund among Churches only was out of the question, because such a measure would be in conflict with the sentiments of the people, the opinions of this House, and the pledges which we have given, and which must be redeemed. The application of it to education would not fall so directly under the ban as the direct application of it to religion; but to propose to apply these funds to education would, in the first place, raise a just suspicion on the part of our Irish friends that we were endeavouring to get quit of the annual Grants in the Estimates; and, in the second place, it would launch us into a multitude of religious difficulties, and would again complicate the controversy of the National Church with the controversy of the unsolved problems of education. It has been proposed by some that the fund should be applied to public works in Ireland. Those who have followed the history of the great attempt we made at public works in Ireland in reference to the Shannon drainage will admit that the prospect opened by such a proposal is not very inviting. In the first place, it is a project which would lead to jobbery, and in the next place it would set every part of Ireland at variance with every other part, in the scramble to obtain the largest possible portion of the money. In the third place, do what you could to promote equality, the application of the money must be unequal, it must be given to certain districts, and many other districts must in a great degree fail to share in it; and, lastly, if this is to be given in the way of a loan for public works, each public work having ended, and the money coming back, it becomes again available. There is no successor immediately entitled to we think defective, and which might be greatly improved. The medium I speak of is the county cess, a heavy and increasing tax—a tax not divided like the Poor Law between the owner and the occupier, but paid wholly by the occupier, and a tax not limited like the Poor Law to occupations above £4 in value, but going down to the most miserable hut or cabin. The holders of these most wretched tenements are now required in Ireland, and required increasingly from year to year, to pay not that which is paid by the wealthier portion of the occupants, who contribute to the Poor Law, but to pay for that class of want and suffering which ought undoubtedly to be met, and which in every great community ought to be liberally met, but which can only be met by the expenditure of large and considerable funds in comparison with those which avail for the support of the pauperized population. Now, what are these? I take first the lunatic asylums. The care of lunatics is one of the great duties of the community, and in Ireland, though the provision for them has as yet by no means overtaken the whole country, the cost on this head is already from £120,000 to £140,000 a year, and will ultimately rise to £200,000. This expenditure is defrayed by the county cess, collected from the class of occupiers I have described.

The case of the deaf and dumb and of the blind is the next melancholy topic I will refer to, and they constitute the sorest places of the social system, and suffer from the most grievous and painful afflictions with which humanity is vexed, and for which no Poor Law can provide. The care of these is a very expensive matter. You will keep a pauper in a workhouse, and keep him decently, in Ireland, for some £7 or £8 a year; but you will not keep these classes—you will not give to the deaf and dumb and the blind the most precious boon you can give them—that is, training and instruction—under, perhaps, £30 or £40 per head per year. It is no common act to train these people and to convey to them through the beneficial channels that the Almighty has given us the blessings of knowledge and the faculty of applying their bodily powers to their own support. This description of want and suffering is, it appears to me, marked out by every feature that can recommend it for the application of any funds like these. There are those who say these funds should not be secularized. I respect the feelings of those who are against the secularization of such funds; but I say that if we go back to the history of ecclesiastical property in Europe the suggested application is not to be condemned and denounced as secularization.

The property of the Church was divisible into four parts. One of these was consecrated to the use of the poor; and, of all the poor, the afflicted classes I have named make the strongest appeal to human compassion. At the same time, when I know the condition of the Irish peasant, when I see that the charge, through the medium of the county cess, is to be laid mainly upon him, in the first instance, and wholly upon him by the present machinery of the law, I hail the occasion this gives us of at once effecting a great improvement in relieving the Irish occupier, and especially the poor occupier, from an important portion of his burden, and of providing a more ample, a more uniform, and a better regulated source of income for the relief of the very sorest of human wants and afflictions. The general framework of this plan will be developed when the third of the days I have described is arrived at. It will be the duty of the Commission to report to the Queen that provision is made for all the purposes contemplated in the Act, and it will be their duty also to report what is the amount of surplus revenue available for these ulterior purposes, the whole of which will be enumerated in the Bill. I will not trouble the Committee now by reading them. I will not say whether or not it might be necessary to resort to further legislation; but these sums would be administered, not under any system wholly new, but they would be administered upon principles and according to rules which are already in partial and imperfect operation in Ireland. We shall escape altogether that which is called the religious difficulty, because we only propose to continue to stand upon ground, the firmness and solidity of which we have already ascertained by experience, and to make these sums available for their destined application, probably in most cases through the medium, and in all cases under the control—and that we provide in the Bill—of the Poor Law Commissioners for Ireland. I have mentioned lunatics first, because the provision to be made for lunatics is the largest of all. Next to these in order is the making a satisfactory provision for the training and instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind. I beg the Committee to understand I am not now speaking of institutions in which the deaf, the dumb, and the blind are to be mewed up for life, but simply of schools in which they may receive that kind of instruction that they are capable of receiving for their own benefit; then to go out again into the world and play their part, so far as Providence permits, as useful members of society. We believe that a good system in aid of the Poor Law may be provided for that class of persons at an expense of about £30,000 a-year, and the ultimate expense of the provision for lunatics would be £185,000 a-year. The provision for other forms of mental weakness besides that I have named—that is, for idiots and others—might cost about £20,000 a-year. There is a provision urgently needed in Ireland, and that is a supply of properly trained nurses for the use of paupers and for the poor who are above the paupers. In Ireland, I apprehend I am correct in saying the Irish medical men are known for their skill; but they are scattered over the country much more thinly than in England. The unions are large, and the public medical officer cannot be in two places at once. I am sorry to be informed upon good authority that the injuries to health, and even to life, which result from the want of skilled nurses, especially for women in labour, are grievous. The Poor Law Guardians shrink from incurring the necessary expense, and make the requisite provision in very few cases; but for a sum of £15,000 a year nurses might be provided all over Ireland. Reformatories and industrial schools languish in Ireland; they receive Parliamentary Grants; but between Parliamentary Grants and private benevolence they are inadequately supported. We shall propose to the Committee that they also be included as recipients of £10,000 of these funds. There is another charge, and that is for county infirmaries, to which I must call the particular attention of Irish Members. The infirmary system of Ireland is at present principally charged upon the county cess, and is a burden on the poorest occupiers of the land. It is very imperfect in two particulars. In the first place, it often happens that the infirmary of the county, though in the capital of the county, is not central; and, although it is supported by taxes levied from the whole county, it is really a benefit only to a very small portion of it. In the second place, the government of these infirmaries is wholly antiquated and unsuitable, and needs to be reformed. The sum to be claimed by the county infirmaries, hospitals, &c., may be put down at £51,000 a year.

The general financial result is that I have pointed to a fund of between £7,000,000 and £8,000,000, and the charges which will be most likely to occur under these heads, and which may be assumed from time to time as we are provided with the means, amount to £311,000 a year. With the provision of all these requirements I think we should be able to combine very great reforms; we shall be able to apply strict principles of economy and good administration to all these departments; we shall be able to re-divide Ireland into districts around county infirmaries, well managed and governed, and so disposed as greatly to increase facility of access to them. Lastly, I have to mention that to which I confess I attach very great value and importance. It should be known that the state of things I have pointed out with regard to the county cess has attracted the attention of Irish Members, and the attention of a Committee of this House, which has recommended that the county cess be put upon the same footing as the poor rate, that the poorer occupiers be relieved, and that the payment be divided between the landlord and the tenant. We certainly shall be in a better condition for inviting the Irish landlord to accede to that change when we are able to offer, as we shall offer by this plan, a considerable diminution of the burden of the county cess. This is, in general terms, the mode in which we propose to apply the residue, and I feel quite satisfied that I am justified in inviting to it the serious attention of the Committee, and in expressing a confident expectation and belief that the more it is examined the more they will find—passing over objections that may be made to disestablishment and disendowment—it is in itself a good and solid plan, full of public advantage.

I believe I have now gone through the chief of the almost endless arrangements, and I have laid, as well as I am able, the plans of the Government before the Committee. I will not venture to anticipate the judgment of the Committee; but I trust the Committee will be of opinion it is a plan at any rate loyal to the expectations we held out on a former occasion, and loyal to the people of England who believed our promises. I hope also the Members of the Committee may think that the best pains we could give have been applied in order to develop and mature the measure, and I say that with great submission to the judgment of Gentlemen on this and on the other side of the House. It is a subject of legislation so exceedingly complex and varied that I have no doubt there must be errors, there must be omissions, and there may be many possible improvements; and we shall welcome from every side, quite irrespective of differences of opinion on the great outlines of the measure, suggestions which, when those outlines are decided upon, may tend to secure a more beneficial application of these funds to the welfare of the people of Ireland. I trust, Sir, that although its operation be stringent, and although we have not thought it either politic or allowable to attempt to diminish its stringency by making it incomplete, the spirit towards the Church of Ireland as a religious communion in which this measure has been considered and prepared by my Colleagues and myself has not been a spirit of unkindness. Perhaps at this moment I can hardly expect—it would be too much to expect—to obtain full credit for any declaration of that kind. We are undoubtedly asking an educated, highly respected, and generally pious and zealous body of clergymen to undergo a great transition; we are asking a powerful and intelligent minority of the laity in Ireland, in connection with the Established Church, to abate a great part of the exceptional privileges they have enjoyed; but I do not feel that in making this demand upon them we are seeking to inflict an injury. I do not believe they are exclusively or even mainly responsible for the errors of English policy towards Ireland; I am quite certain that in many vital respects they have suffered by it; I believe that the free air they will breathe under a system of equality and justice, giving scope for the development of their great energies, with all the powers of property and intelligence they will bring to bear, will make that Ireland which they love a country for them not less enviable and not less beloved in the future than it has been in the past. As respects the Church, I admit it is the case almost without exception. I do not know in what country so great a change, so great a transition has been proposed for the ministers of a religious communion who have enjoyed for many ages the preferred position of an Established Church. I can well understand that to many in the Irish Establishment such a change appears to be nothing less than ruin and destruction; from the height on which they now stand the future is to them an abyss, and their fears recall the words used in King Lear when Edgar endeavours to persuade Gloster that he has fallen over the cliffs of Dover, and says—

Which thou hast perpendicularly fallen;
Thy life's a miracle.”

And yet, but a little while after the old man is relieved from his delusion, and finds he has not fallen at all. So I trust that when, instead of the fictitious and adventitious aid on which we have too long taught the Irish Establishment to lean, it should come to place its trust in its own resources, in its own great mission, in all that it can draw from the energy of its ministers and its members, and the high hopes and promises of the Gospel that it teaches, it will find that it has entered upon a new era of existence—an era bright with hope and potent for good. At any rate, I think the day has certainly come when an end is finally to be put to that union, not between the Church and religious association, but between the Establishment and the State, which was commenced under circumstances little auspicious, and has endured to be a source of unhappiness to Ireland, and of discredit and scandal to England. There is more to say—This measure is in every sense a great measure—great in its principles, great in the multitude of its dry, technical, but interesting detail, and great as a testing measure; for it will show for one and all of us of what metal we are made. Upon us all it brings a great responsibility—great and foremost upon those who occupy this Bench. We are especially chargeable—nay, deeply guilty,

if we have either dishonestly, as some think, or even prematurely or unwisely challenged so gigantic an issue. I know well the punishments that follow rashness in public affairs, and that ought to fall upon those men, those Phætons of politics, who, with hands unequal to the task, attempt to guide the chariot of the sun. But the responsibility, though heavy, does not exclusively press upon us—it presses upon every man who has to take part in the discussion and decision upon this Bill. Every man approaches the discussion under the most solemn obligations to raise the level of his vision and expand its scope in proportion with the greatness of the matter in hand. The working of our constitutional government itself is upon its trial, for I do not believe there ever was a time when the wheels of legislative machinery were set in motion under conditions of peace and order and constitutional regularity to deal with a question greater or more profound. And more especially, Sir, is the credit and fame of this great Assembly involved; this Assembly, which has inherited through many ages the accumulated honours of brilliant triumphs, of peaceful but courageous legislation, is now called upon to address itself to a task which would, indeed, have demanded all the best energies of the very best among your fathers and your ancestors. I believe it will prove to be worthy of the task. Should it fail, even the fame of the House of Commons will suffer disparagement; should it succeed, even that fame, I venture to say, will receive no small, no insensible addition. I must not ask Gentlemen opposite to concur in this view, emboldened as I am by the kindness they have shown me in listening with patience to a statement which could not have been other than tedious; but I pray them to bear with me for a moment while, for myself and my Colleagues, I say we are sanguine of the issue. We believe, and for my part I am deeply convinced, that when the final consummation shall arrive, and when the words are spoken that shall give the force of law to the work embodied in this measure—the work of peace and justice—those words will be echoed upon every shore where the name of Ireland or the name of Great Britain has been heard, and the answer to them will come back in the approving verdict of civilized mankind. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish to take the earliest opportunity of stating the course that I and those with whom I have the honour of acting propose to take under the present circumstances. We have not, in any degree, changed our opinions respecting the policy which the right hon. Gentleman has so fully, so adequately, and so eloquently placed before the House this evening. We still look upon disestablishment as a great political error; we still look upon disendowment of a Church, particularly when its property is to be applied to secular purposes, as mere and sheer confiscation. With these feelings, it would certainly be my duty, under ordinary circumstances, to resist the Motion made by the right hon. Gentleman; but I cannot conceal from myself that, in coming to a determination as to the course we ought to take, we must not limit ourselves to the consideration of the mere Motion before us. I would not pretend that this new House of Commons can be at all fettered by the decision at which the late House of Commons arrived; but that decision must be taken in conjunction with the circumstances which followed it; it must be taken in conjunction with the decision of the country at the General Election, and the course of the then existing Government in consequence of that decision of the country. Under those circumstances, I feel it is our duty to take a different course from that which otherwise we might have felt it our duty to pursue. I take the fair interpretation of the decision of the country at the General Election to be this, that it was the opinion of the country that the right hon. Gentleman should have the opportunity of dealing with the question of the Church in Ireland. I do not understand that the country pledged itself to support any particular measure. No particular measure was then before it; but it declared and decided, in a manner which could not be mistaken, that the right hon. Gentleman should have a fair and full opportunity of dealing with the question of the Church in Ireland. I cannot, therefore, take this occasion, which might otherwise have been a most legitimate one, of preventing the right hon. Gentleman from placing his policy before the country, and I shall advise none of those whose conduct I can influence to oppose the Motion the right hon. Gentleman has just made. The Motion is one which, if it were not for those wise forms of the House, that I shall always be the first to uphold, would be only equivalent to the right hon. Gentleman asking leave to introduce his Bill and have it read a first time. I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to have the opportunity of placing his policy before the country without any unnecessary delay, nor is it expedient that there should be unnecessary delay in Parliament coming to a decision upon the subject. That there should be a serious and even solemn consideration of the question—that there should be an adequate and even ample debate upon it, I hope no one on either side of the House will for a moment deny; but it does not appear to me that it is at all expedient any time should be lost in having the policy of the right hon. Gentleman fully announced for the consideration of Parliament. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will give ample time to the House and the country for the consideration of his measure before he asks for a decision. The right hon. Gentleman has not yet intimated when he proposes to take the second reading; but it appears to me that it would be possible to give adequate time for the consideration of the measure without incurring unnecessary delay. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow at least three weeks for the consideration of a Bill which we have not yet in our hands. That period is not too long for the consideration of a measure of so complex and various a character, irrespective of the importance of its leading principles. It appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity then of moving the second reading before Easter, and probably of having a decision upon it; and if, as I have heard, and the rumour was to me by no means disagreeable, our Easter holidays are to be only of a nominal character, and are to be made up for at Whitsuntide, then, even if the vote were not taken, the delay would be only from Thursday to Monday. If the right hon. Gentleman gives us three weeks for consideration—[“No, no!”] The hon. Gentleman says “No,” but he has not read the Bill. The statement of the Prime Minister to which we have listened occupied more than three hours, and I willingly admit that not a phrase in it was wasted, but that very circumstance I think justifies the request I have made. I will only repeat that the course we propose to take on the present occasion is to offer no opposition to the Motion. If we wanted delay, we might have offered opposition and have involved the House in a preliminary debate of considerable length. That circumstance, I hope, will be taken into account by the right hon. Gentleman. I trust, therefore, as we are not opposing the Motion, the right hon. Gentleman will accede to my proposition, and allow the House and the country an opportunity for considering this important subject, which involves details all of which must be investigated; and if he pursues that course, he will find that he will have to encounter no unnecessary or vexatious delay.

MR. GLADSTONE: I at once admit that nothing can command my confidence more fully than the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman with respect to the view he takes as to the question of time. I will explain to him exactly, however, the way in which the case lies, and then he will be able to judge how far I can comply with the request made to me, and where it is necessary for me to take a stand. Our wish upon this subject is that this measure shall pass into a law—at any rate that it shall not fail in passing into law through want of time. Now, Sir, the House of Lords is entitled, upon a question of this kind, to a suitable period of time. It is not only entitled to time for discussion on the main stages, but also on the details. I do not think we should be doing very full justice to the House of Lords on this subject if we were to send them this Bill in the month of July. I think it ought to go to them before. I am bound also to say I hold that this Bill ought to take some time in Committee in this House, and I think some considerable time will be required between the second reading and the Committee. It appears to me, if I may say so, that the debate upon the second reading is but very little more than a renewal of the debates of last year, and that it is in Committee the real manipulation of the details will be carried out. I am bound to say that I think it my duty to press the Committee and the House to take the second reading before Easter. If the Bill be in the hands of Members to-morrow, I think that Thursday fortnight is really the latest moment for which the second reading can be fixed.

MR. DISRAELI intimated his assent.

Resolution agreed to.

House resumed.

MR. GLADSTONE signified to the House, That Her Majesty has been pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, for the purposes of the Bill, Her interest in the Archbishoprics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical dignities and benefices in Ireland.

MR. SPEAKER then put the Question that leave be given to bring in the Bill.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE asked for some explanation with respect to the funds said to be in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purpose of carrying out some of the arrangements contemplated by the Prime Minister.

MR. HUNT said, he did not understand, from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, whether the private endowments were to be put into the hands of what was called the Church body or were to be localized.

MR. GLADSTONE: With respect to the private endowments, the expression that I used was that they would pass into the hands of the Church body; but it will remain entirely open for consideration whether some arrangements should not be made which would pass them into the hands of some local authority. It is impossible for us at present to undertake to be acquainted with the terms of all these endowments; but, as the body is to be representative, I assume that all local interests will be sufficiently cared for. That is a matter which, I assume, will be settled among the members of the Disestablished Church in a way which will be most to their interest, and, of course, we should be very glad to enter into their views.

With respect to the question of the hon. Baronet (Sir Frederick Heygate), the sum of £1,100,000 which I described as going in satisfaction of the claims of the Presbyterians and Maynooth, I likewise enumerated among the charges on the Church Fund. As to the savings bank funds in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I introduced that topic only with reference to the facility that these funds would give us for making advances. Of course that has no bearing on the sources whence the funds would ultimately come. There was one point which I forgot to mention in my speech, and that is that there will be introduced into the Bill in Committee some one clause to enable the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to lend, and the Temporalities Commissioners to borrow, for the purpose of arranging these transactions.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to put an end to the Establishment of the Church in Ireland, and to make provision in respect of the Temporalities thereof, and in respect of the Royal College of Maynooth.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODSON, Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. JOHN BRIGHT, Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

Withdrawn—Lord Napier's Annuity Bill* (15).

NEW PEER.

Edward Anthony John Viscount Gormanston in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland, having been created Baron Gormanston of Whitewood in the county of Meath—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

BRAZILIAN SLAVE TRADE BILL—(No. 14.)
(The Earl of Clarendon.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, that before asking their Lordships to give a second reading to this Bill, which proposed to repeal an Act of the 8th and 9th years of Her present Majesty, passed for the purpose of putting an end to the Brazilian Slave Trade, by giving to Her Majesty's ships a right to search Brazilian vessels, he thought it would be proper that he should state the circumstances under which that Act was passed, and those which now seemed to justify its repeal. It was hardly necessary for him to refer to the large scale on which the slave trade was at one time carried on by the Brazilians—he believed he might say without exaggerating, that between 1827 and 1844 nearly 300,000 slaves were imported into Brazil in defiance of treaties and of the reprobation of the civilized world. In 1845, the Brazilian Government notified to the British Government that the Convention of 1826 between the two countries providing for mutual right of search and Mixed Commission Courts having expired, they did not intend to renew it. But although Her Majesty's Government did not deny the right of the Brazilian Government thus to announce the close of the arrangement, still they were not prepared to allow the removal of all check upon this nefarious traffic, which there was now every chance would be carried on on a larger scale than ever. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government introduced a Bill providing that, the Mixed Commission Courts having come to an end with the expiration of the treaty, the Court of Admiralty should have power to adjudicate upon and dispose of all questions arising out of the capture of slave vessels, and the disposal of the property of the owners. The Bill was introduced into this House by Lord Aberdeen, and into the other House by Sir Robert Peel; it passed without any division, and was commonly known as the Aberdeen Act. Simultaneously with its passing, Her Majesty's Minister at Rio was instructed to assure the Brazilian Government of the regret felt by the British Government that no other course was open to them, expressing also a hope that this state of things would not be permanent, and declaring that as soon as the slave trade should have been virtually pulled down, or the Brazilian Government should enter into any treaty or convention to act in concert with the British Government, this right of search and of adjudication should be given up. The provisions of the Act made, as might have been expected, a very unfavourable impression on the Brazilian Government, and they remonstrated strongly against it; but they did nothing whatever to check the traffic, for while in 1845 the number of slaves introduced into Brazil was estimated at 19,450, in 1846 it was 50,324; in 1847, 56,172; in 1848, 60,000; in 1849, 54,000; and in 1850, 23,000, of whom 17,000 were imported during the first six months. The reason of the reduction in the latter half of that year was, that Her Majesty's Government, finding that the trade was more flourishing than ever, and that the Brazilian Government were regardless of their obligations to put an end to it, made a change in the instructions of the commanders of our cruisers, and they were made more stringent. Hitherto our ships of war had been permitted only to seize Brazilian slavers on the high seas, but thenceforth they were allowed to seize them within Brazilian waters and Brazilian harbours and ports. The consequence was that numerous prizes were made, which were disposed of by our Admiralty Courts. This caused great alarm in Brazil, and in 1850 their Government passed a severe penal law against the slave trade, and commenced operations for its suppression. The result was that in 1851 only 3,287 slaves were imported; in 1852, 800; in 1853-4, none; and there was no record of any landing of slaves since 1855, when an attempt was made and ninety slaves were landed, all of whom, however, with the exception of three, were captured by the Brazilian Government. It was only fair, too, to that Government to mention that they had lately manumitted large numbers of slaves who were the property of the Government, and that the tendency of the legislation of Brazil—whether based on abhorrence of the trade he did not know, but certainly based on what they believed to be the real interests of the country—was not only adverse to the slave trade, but was favourable to the entire abolition of slavery throughout the country. Twelve or fourteen years having elapsed without any importation of slaves having been known to have occurred in Brazil, the time seemed to have arrived for fulfilling the assurance made by the English Government that they did not desire the Act of 1845 to be permanent, but were willing that it should cease when the slave trade had ceased. The time, he repeated, had come for repealing an Act which as long as it existed was a standing affront to a nation with whom we desired to be on friendly terms. On these grounds he hoped their Lordships would assent to the second reading of the Bill. Before sitting down, it might be interesting to their Lordships that he should mention that since 1866, there was no authentic record of any cargo of slaves having been introduced into Cuba, an island where the trade used to be carried on to a very great extent. Three attempts to embark slaves on the coast of Africa had been unsuccessful, two of the vessels being seized by British cruisers, and the third being run ashore and destroyed. Looking to the present state and future prospects of Cuba, there was every hope that the trade would cease, and it was satisfactory to know that a notorious individual who had actively carried on the trade on the African coast had lately broken up his establishment and left the country.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Clarendon.)

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that having at the time when the Act of 1845 was passed held the Office of Attorney General, to which he had shortly before succeeded on the lamented death of Sir William Follett, it might probably be taken for granted that he was one of the Advisers of the Government with regard to the introduction of that Bill. Now he begged distinctly to state that he was not consulted at all prior to its introduction, and that the Government acted on the counsels of men of much greater weight and authority than himself. Sir Robert Peel stated, in reference to that Bill, that having taken the advice of the highest authorities in the country, including the late lamented Sir William Follett, their deliberate opinion was that under the Convention, failing the agreement and consent of the Brazilian Government to other measures for the suppression of the trade, we were entirely authorized in continuing to exercise the right of search over Brazilian vessels. He (Lord Chelmsford) must confess he always entertained serious doubts as to our right to pass such an Act; but the Bill having been introduced he was, of course, placed in a position of some embarrassment. Being now, however, released from all responsibility, and able to exercise an unfettered judgment on the subject, he must confess that, on renewed consideration of it, he felt surprised that the eminent men alluded to by Sir Robert Peel should ever have thought that the Act was one which this country had any right to pass. He was, therefore, quite prepared to assent to its repeal. His reason for saying so was this—The Convention with Brazil in 1826, after its separation from Portugal, was designed to renew and confirm the stipulations contained in our treaties with Portugal for the abolition of the slave trade, those treaties being dated 1815 and 1817, and their important stipulations being a reciprocal right of search and the establishment of Mixed Commission Courts for the adjudication of captured slavers. Following out those treaties, the Convention provided, by its third article, that all matters and things contained in the treaties should be applied, mutatis mutandis, as effectually as if inserted therein word for word; and the fourth article provided for the establishment of Mixed Commission Courts, providing that they should bear the form of that established by the Convention of 1817. Now the first article of that Convention was the foundation of the Act of 1845. That first article provided that after the expiration of three years from the ratification of the treaty it should not be lawful for the subjects of the Emperor of Brazil to be concerned in the slave trade, and that any person being so should be deemed and treated as guilty of piracy. There was a difference of opinion as to the exact meaning of this article. It was contended by the Government of the day that by this article Brazil agreed to deliver over to us Brazilian subjects engaged in the slave trade, to be treated as pirates. But this was surely a very strained construction, the fair and reasonable view being that Brazil, for the purpose of showing her sincere desire to abolish the slave trade, promised to deal with her own subjects who engaged in it as if they had committed acts of piracy. The object of the Convention plainly was that there should be reciprocal right of search and Mixed Commission Courts, and that Great Britain was authorized to demand the performance of the first article, in case she refused to deal with her subjects in the stipulated manner. Under the treaty with Portugal of 1817 there was power, under certain circumstances, of bringing it to an end at the expiration of fifteen years from the exchange of the ratification; but whether that stipulation was one of those incorporated into the Convention was immaterial, it being conceded both by Lord Aberdeen and Sir Robert Peel that the Convention had been brought to an end. Sir Robert Peel, speaking on the subject, said, "that the Government had the power at its own discretion to terminate the subsidiary Convention of 1842; Brazil had given notice that that Convention had come to an end, and Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to concede the right;" but he added that "there remained in force the original article of the treaty of 1826, and that the object of the Bill was to give effect to the stipulations of that treaty." Now, why Sir Robert Peel spoke of a "subsidiary" Convention it was not easy to understand, for there was only one Convention, and as far as Brazil was concerned all of its articles were as much original articles as the first was. It being admitted that the Convention had been brought to an end, it was assumed that the first article survived and was of lasting obligation; but he (Lord Chelmsford) must say that this was a very extraordinary construction. The article gave the right of search as a distinct stipulation; it was adopted into the Convention from the treaty of 1817. But the Convention of 1826 having been determined, and the Mixed Commission Courts having determined at the same time, it was a strong construction by the British Government that the right of search survived. The object of the Act of 1845 was to continue the right of search, which had been abolished by the termination of the treaty, and to give to the Court of Admiralty the power of adjudication in cases of capture of slavers, which had been expressly excluded by the Act 7 & 8 Geo. IV., passed to give effect to the Convention of 1826. This was a most extraordinary way of dealing with Brazilian subjects, and he could not but think that had a stronger State been in question we should hardly have ventured on such a procedure. Brazil would scarcely have allowed the right of search had it not been connected with the establishment of Mixed Commission Courts, and she could never have contemplated delivering up her subjects to our Courts. The Act, too, appeared to have been ingeniously rather than ingenuously framed, so as to avoid mentioning the termination of the treaty, which was obviously a formidable objection to it. Accordingly, the first part of the Convention only was recited, and it was then enacted that for the purpose of carrying it out the 7 & 8 Geo. IV. should be repealed, and the Court of Admiralty be allowed to exercise jurisdiction, and the Mixed Commission Court be continued six months for the adjudication of pending cases. If the Preamble had recited that the treaty was at an end there would perhaps have been an end of the Act, as obviously inconsistent with that statement. Formidable objections were urged against the measure by Sir Thomas Wilde, and on referring to the few observations made by himself in reply it would be seen how difficult he felt it to give any satisfactory answer to those objections. The Act ought never to have passed, and he was glad that this standing offence to Brazil was now to be wiped off the Statute-book.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he was sure their Lordships must have heard with great pleasure the noble Earl's announcement of the cessation of this abominable trade in Brazil, and also of its interruption in Cuba. The most hopeful and healthy feature of the case was the noble Earl's statement that there had grown up in Brazil a state of public feeling most hostile to the traffic. He trusted that this great success would induce Her Majesty's Government to watch for every opening in order to bring about a similar result as regarded the eastern coast of Africa, where, he believed, the slave trade was as bad as it ever had been on the western coast. The half measures adopted by this country had done little more than all such measures in the case of grievous diseases; they aggravated and intensified the symptoms. He believed the trade was carried on with more circumstances of cruelty than at any former time or in any other part of that unhappy country. The necessity of keeping slaves after their capture until an opportunity of escaping our cruisers occurred had led to an amount of cruelty and loss of life in the barracoons where they were confined which was perfectly appalling. He earnestly hoped energetic measures of repression would be taken with regard to the atrocious traffic on the east coast.

LORD CAIRNS said, that the noble Earl's statement of the present state of slavery in Brazil—whether that state had been brought about by our legislation, or whether, as was probably the case, by the improved public feeling in Brazil—must give unqualified satisfaction. The repeal of the Act of 1845 was so right and proper a measure that he was unwilling to take exception to the manner in which it was proposed to be done; but he regretted that, instead of simply and unconditionally repealing the Act, the Preamble stated that the circumstances which led to its passing no longer existed, by reason of the cessation of the importation of slaves into Brazil. No doubt that was the case; but he thought the Act ought to be repealed unconditionally, and not for reasons of cessation. The Act was one which ought never to have been passed, being an attempt by legislation to deal with the subjects and property of an independent sovereign Power, and in the case of a stronger Power than Brazil the Parliament of this country would never have passed it. It was introduced by Sir Robert Peel's Government, and Lord Palmerston, whose opinions on this subject were well known, being at the time in Opposition, the Opposition which would otherwise have been fatal to so anomalous a measure, was neutralized, so that it passed without a division. Sir Robert Peel, in the debate upon the Bill, made a singular admission. He said that it seemed a very strong measure for us to legislate for Brazilian subjects, and that although we had the Treaty of 1826, which stipulated that the slave trade should be deemed to be piracy on the part of Brazil, the Government would not venture to deal by legislation with the persons and lives of Brazilian subjects, but would only deal with their property. Now, if Sir Robert Peel's view of the treaty had been right, and if the stipulation meant that we were to be at liberty on the high seas, or within Brazilian waters, to enforce against those engaged in the traffic the penalties of piracy, we had as much right to proceed against their persons and lives as against their property. Sir Robert Peel's admission was thus really fatal to the measure. The result of the Act had been that since 1845 our relations with Brazil had been kept in a continual state of irritation, and this was not surprising. He should like to have some information on a point connected with the Act of 1845. Some English merchants had for many years had large unsettled claims against the Brazilian Government, and some years ago a Mixed Commission was appointed to investigate the claims on both sides; but after the Commissioners had sat some time, and when the British claims were on the point of being settled, diplomatic relations were broken off in consequence of this chronic state of irritation, and the sittings were suspended. Now, he should be glad to know whether there was any probability of the resumption or re-commencement of the adjudication on these claims.

EARL GREY said, he did not intend to debate a question which was settled more than twenty years ago, but he felt bound to declare his utter and total dissent from the remarks of the two noble and learned Lords who had preceded him. He had been one of the supporters of the Act when it was passed, because he regarded it as one of the wisest and best measures ever submitted to the British Parliament, and it had certainly proved most successful—it had fully answered the purposes for which it was intended, and had prevented a vast amount of human suffering, reflecting therefore, the greatest honour on those by whom it was brought forward and supported. He would not go into legal subtleties as to the meaning of the articles of the treaty, for the question stood on far higher ground. Brazil had solemnly bound herself to do her best to suppress the slave trade, and, in return for that obligation, had received great favours and advantages from us. But she had totally failed to fulfil her obligation and had systematically and deliberately violated the faith she had pledged to us; and under these circumstances it became a great nation like England to look not to particular expressions, but to the substantial merits of the case—to the great and eternal principles of morality; and to say that Brazil having failed to fulfil her promises to put down the iniquitous traffic in slaves, we had the right and having the right it was our duty, in the interests of humanity, to enforce those obligations, and to take the best means of compelling Brazil to execute them effectually. These were the grounds on which Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen proposed the measure, with the full concurrence of the Leaders of the Opposition of that day, and for himself he must say that he at the time fully concurred in the justice of the measure. He therefore thoroughly differed from the two noble and learned Lords in the remarks they had made on the propriety of the measure of 1845. He would only say further that he had some doubts as to the expediency of passing the Bill which was now before them. It was said there was a great change in the state of feeling in Brazil upon this subject. He hoped that was true; but at the same time he could not forget that if there was any change it had been brought about by the great pressure brought to bear upon them by the law which it was now sought to repeal. He could not forget that, as long as Brazil did really and heartily exert herself to prevent the slave trade, this law would remain a mere dead letter. That it was an affront to Brazil at the time it was passed he admitted, but it was an affront which was richly deserved. He hoped his noble Friend had fully satisfied himself that the conduct of Brazil in this matter was now without fault. He had not looked into the question for some years past, but he was under the impression that some time since Brazil, in spite of most urgent remonstrances, persisted in keeping in slavery a number of persons who had been imported from the coast of Africa, and whom they were under obligations to set free. He believed they were detained under some form of apprenticeship; but he supposed that had now come to a termination. As he understood that his noble Friend had no reason to doubt the fairness of the spirit in which Brazil was prepared to exert herself for the suppression of the slave trade, and of the existence of slavery, he would not oppose the Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he also shared the surprise of the noble Earl (Earl Grey) at the speeches of the two noble and learned Lords opposite. It was hardly necessary in discussing the second reading of this Bill to discuss the merits of the Bill which Sir Robert Peel introduced in 1845. The practical effect of it could only be to strengthen the Brazilian idea that they had a strong reclamation against the international injustice of this country. For himself he believed there was no doubt of the legality of that measure, though it was generally admitted to be of a high-handed character, and that it might be construed into an insult. He believed, however, it was necessary in the then state of the temper and conduct of Brazil. He would not enter into the question of its original legality. He saw no danger in repealing it, for the traffic had long ceased, and the more enlightened feeling which now existed in Brazil and the self interests of the people were a security against the recurrence of the evil. It was very desirable, too, that the relations between two countries which were so closely connected by commerce should be placed on a friendly footing. and the noble Earl (Earl Grey) was quite mistaken in thinking that the Brazilians felt indifferent at present on the subject.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

COMMON LAW COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.
(The Earl Granville.)

(NO. 19.) SECOND READING.

LORD DUFFERIN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, explained that an Act had already been passed assimilating the procedure of the Irish Chancery Courts to the English Courts, and that the present measure took the same course with regard to the Common Law Courts. It was framed in accordance with the recommendation of a Select Committee of which distinguished legal authorities were members.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE viewed with great satisfaction the introduction of the Bill into this House; but, in consideration of its having been only just printed, he deferred the observations he might feel it necessary to make upon it until the Motion for going into Committee.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS,
22 GEO. III. c. 45.—QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill during the present Session to repeal the Act 22 Geo. III., c. 45, entitled "An Act for restraining any person concerned in any contract, commission, or agreement made for the Public Service from being elected or sitting and voting as a Member of the House of Commons?"

MR. GLADSTONE: Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the working of the law in respect to Government contractors is not altogether satisfactory; but at the same time I cannot say that, at the present moment, they see their way to the manner in which it ought to be dealt with, or that they are prepared, considering the business they have yet in hand, to bring in a measure during the present Session. At the same time, it is a matter for consideration, and if any Member of Parliament should think fit to introduce a Bill for the purpose of improving the state of the law in that respect, they would lend to it an impartial and friendly consideration.

IRELAND—THE LIVING OF VALENTIA.
QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BATESON, who had a Question on the Paper, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there is any foundation for the rumour that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has refused to appoint to the Living of Valentia, co. Kerry, which is now vacant; and, whether the course pursued by His Excellency has been sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government? said, that considering the statement which had been made on the previous evening by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, he would not put his Question.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I trust I may be excused for answering the Question which has not been put to me by my hon. Friend; because, when once a Question has been put upon the Notice Paper it becomes a matter of general interest. What took place in connection with the living of Valentia I believe was this—Valentia has a population of 3,000 persons, of whom seventy-nine, or about one-fortieth part, belong to the communion of the Established Church. Her Majesty's Government have not presumed to come to any absolute and final conclusion with regard to those livings which may become vacant between the time when they came into Office and the time when the judgment of Parliament will be given upon the proposals which they have introduced with respect to the Irish Church. Especially they have not come to any resolution which will prevent them from taking care that the wants of any parish, with a considerable population, are supplied. With respect to parishes of the particular class of Valentia, what we had to consider was, that no great inconvenience would arise to the population from any temporary delay in making an appointment, inasmuch as the present law sufficiently provides the Bishop of the diocese with the means of making provision for the spiritual wants of the living. Under these circumstances, I think the Lord Lieutenant has exercised a sound judgment in not making a new appointment in a case like this, where the population of the Established Church is only about a fortieth or a fiftieth part of the whole population, seeing that that appointment would necessarily create a vested interest for life.

CARDINAL CULLEN AND THE PRIVY COUNCIL OF IRELAND.—QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BATESON said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, as is stated in some of the public prints, it is in the contemplation of the Government to recommend to Her Majesty that Cardinal Cullen should be appointed a member of the Privy Council in Ireland?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, he was not aware that the statement referred to had been made in any quarter until he had read it upon the Notice Paper. No such intention had ever been entertained by the Government.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.—QUESTION.

MR. G. CLIVE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any legislation on the subject of Turnpike Trusts is contemplated during the present Session?

Mr. Gladstone

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that the Government had no intention of introducing such a Bill this Session.

QUESTION.

MR. KAVANAGH said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for New Ross, If he will kindly consent to postpone the Second Reading of his Poor Law Amendment Bill from the 7th to the 14th of April?

MR. M'MAHON said, he was sorry that he could not accede to the request.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If his attention has been called to the present condition of the Royal Naval Reserve; and if it is his intention to introduce any measure to increase its efficiency?

MR. CHILDERS, in reply, said, his attention had not been called in any specific manner to the condition of the Reserve; but that he would state the course which the Admiralty proposed to adopt with regard to it when he moved the Navy Estimates.

AGRICULTURAL LABOUR COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, How many English Counties have been visited (including those now under investigation) by the Assistant Commissioners appointed under the Commission on the employment of children, young persons, and women in agriculture; and, whether it is the intention of the Chief Commissioners to obtain any evidence in Scotland illustrative of the many subjects touched upon in the first Report of the Commission?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he might be permitted to answer the Question by enumerating the counties that had not been visited. These counties were Lancashire, Staffordshire, Yorkshire, Shropshire, Derbyshire, Worcestershire, Hertfordshire, Cornwall, and all Wales. With respect to Scotland, the powers of the Commissioners did not extend to that country; but it was under consideration whether their inquiries should not include Scotland.

INDIA—THE RECENT ACCIDENT AT THE BHOORE GHAUT.—QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any and what kind of inquiry has been or is to be instituted into the circumstances of the recent fatal accident at the Bhoore Ghaut on the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, and whether any steps can be taken to guard against such occurrences in future?

MR. GRANT DUFF, in reply, said, that the Government of Bombay had decided to appoint a Commission to inquire into the circumstances of the accident, and that a Bill was to be introduced into the Legislative Council to give that Commission full powers as to taking evidence. Meanwhile precautions had been taken to prevent passenger trains entering on the Bhoore Ghaut incline when it appeared to be in a dangerous condition.

POOR RELIEF ASSESSMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, When he expects to lay upon the Table of the House a Return of Poor Relief Assessment, ordered on the 18th February, 1868?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that the Returns had not been printed because much of the information to which they related was to be found in the proceedings of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into compound-householding.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK.

QUESTION.

MR. W. COWPER said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the large accumulations of refuse from brick-kilns, that now cover the green slopes of Hyde Park, near the lower end of the Serpentine, have been placed there in the hope that they will imitate rock-work; or, if not, for what purpose they have been brought there?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said he could assure his right hon. Friend that he had not the slightest intention of cheating him or any one else into the belief that the brickwork was intended for rock-work. What his right hon. Friend, with a poetical licence, called "the green slopes" of Hyde Park formed merely the banks of a very dirty ditch, through which fell the outcome of the Serpentine. The brickwork had been placed there simply because it would form a good foundation for the subsoil in which certain shrubs were to be planted. He hoped that in a short time the plantation would be completed, and the offensive sight removed.

METROPOLIS—VICTORIA PARK.

QUESTION.

MR. C. REED said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, What portion of the Royal Park, known as the Victoria Park, has been leased for building sites; what average annual revenue is derived from the land so leased; what is the value of the land yet remaining unleased retained for the Park; what is the average annual cost of maintaining the Park; and whether, having regard to the population in the Eastern part of the Metropolis, the Government will sanction the permanent retention of such lands as are unleased for the public advantage?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, that every part of his hon. Friend's Question, except one, belonged to the province of the Commissioner of Woods, but he had obtained the information necessary to enable him to give an answer. With regard to the first part of the Question, he had to state that no part of Victoria Park had been leased for building purposes. The Crown possessed property in that quarter, consisting of 265 acres, part of which was appropriated to Victoria Park, the remainder, under two Acts of Parliament was leased by the Commissioner of Woods for the purposes of revenue and for the maintenance of the Park. The present revenue derived from the land so leased was £1,500 a year. The value of the land still unleased was, he understood, about £4,000 a year. The average annual cost of maintaining the Park was £6,300, consequently the annual rental of the Crown land when the whole was leased would go far towards meeting it. With regard to the last Question, he would say that the Government had no power to retain those lands under the Act. They were leased by the Office of Woods for the benefit of the revenue and the maintenance of Victoria Park.

NAVY—AUSTRALIAN PRESERVED MEATS.—QUESTION.

MR. LUSK said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If his attention has been directed to the reports in the public journals of the large quantities of Australian and other preserved meats that are offered for sale at about six pence per pound; if he has seen the favourable statement of His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh in regard to the Australian preserved meat published in "The Times" of 2nd November, 1868; and, whether, seeing that the preserved meats produced at the Deptford Dockyard (according to Parliamentary Return, No. 353, of last Session) cost eleven pence per pound, he intends to continue to supply the Navy with that manufactured by Government, or to buy in the open market?

MR. CHILDERS: I beg to inform the hon. Gentleman and the House that, so far back as 1865, the attention of the Government was called to the possibility of obtaining meat for the use of the navy from the Australian colonies at a lower cost than that which was purchased in this country; and inquiries took place through the agency of one of the Australian Governments, which did not at that time end in any satisfactory arrangement being made. However, during the past year the question has been revived again, and before the present Board took Office a certain quantity of Australian preserved meat was purchased and issued to different ships, in order that the opinion of the officers and crews of those ships might be had as to the value of the meat. From many of those ships replies have been received, the greater part of which are of a satisfactory character; and, at the present time, the Admiralty are preparing a notice for tenders for the supply of a certain quantity of preserved Australian beef of the present year. I shall be able to state, on Vote 2 in the Navy Estimates, the probable financial result of such an arrangement if it is satisfactorily carried out.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES ACT REPEAL BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the second reading of this Bill stood on the Orders for Thursday, and he begged to ask the hon. Member for Meath on what day he intended to proceed with that Order? and to give him Notice that unless a day was fixed giving a reasonable and proper opportunity for discussion he would oppose the postponement of the Order on Thursday next.

MR. MAC EVOY said, that he stated last night, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole), that he was not then in a position to name the day, nor was he now; but he hoped on Thursday night to fix it, and it would be the most convenient he could find after Easter.

INDIA—THE GARRISON OF KOHAT. QUESTION.

MR. WYLLIE inquired of the Under Secretary for India, What truth there might be in a very alarming rumour to the effect that the garrison of Kohat had been surprised by a party of Oorukzais, and that the British had sustained a loss of 300 men?

MR. GRANT DUFF thanked his hon. Friend for having given him an opportunity of immediately contradicting a rumour which must have caused such terrible anxiety that day in so many English homes. The real state of affairs would be best shown by his reading a telegram from the Viceroy, dated Calcutta, Feb. 27. It was as follows:—

"On the 13th inst. party of Oorukzais surprised police post near Kohat when police were asleep. Three men taken away. One killed. Lieut-Governor has authorized Colonel Keyes to make a day's march from Kohat into the pass for the purpose of punishment."

A later telegram said that Colonel Keyes's expedition had been a success.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE. MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. ACLAND, in rising to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the action with reference to Agriculture of various Public Authorities, with a view to consider the expediency of recommending that some one Department be made responsible for dealing with administrative and legislative questions affecting Agriculture, said, he did not propose to revive the debate on local taxation which had been opened by his hon. Friend (Sir Massey Lopes) the other evening in a speech remarkable for its ability and for the success which had attended it. He differed from the hon. Baronet in many respects, but when he gave notice on the first night of the Session of his wish to move for a Committee to inquire into the incidence of local taxation, it was not his intention to trespass on a subject which his hon. Friend had made his own. His object merely was to clear up certain questions as to the relation between tenants and landlords, and between country parishes and town parishes, upon which there had been a great deal of misunderstanding, tending to create an undue sense of grievance, and an expectation of remedies which he thought impossible. He did not wish to anticipate another debate, to which country Members were looking forward with great interest on the introduction by Her Majesty's Government of their intended measure for the establishment of County Financial Boards. Neither was it his intention to ask for the appointment here, as in foreign countries, of a Minister of Agriculture, whose duty it would be to nurse up farmers. But what he did intend was to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the action with reference to Agriculture of certain Public Authorities. It had been said that his proposal was to introduce new functionaries, new officers, new salaries, and in fact, as he had heard it stated that morning, a new "Circumlocution Office." But that was not the case. Public authorities were already engaged with a great deal of business which affected the interests of agriculture and the production of food in this country. The public authorities connected with that subject were of two kinds, local and Imperial. Among the local authorities were magistrates, Boards of Guardians, Highway Boards, Turnpike Commissioners, Sewers Commissioners, and Commissioners of Taxes. But he did not propose an Inquiry into all the details of those various local bodies. He desired more particularly to direct attention to the Imperial authorities established in the metropolis; and they included the Home Office, the Privy Council, and the Board of Trade; while subordinate to these were the Copyhold and Inclosure Commissioners, the Cattle Plague branch (when called into existence by the Privy Council), the Health Office, the Local Government Office, and the Statistical Office of the Board of Trade. It was not a question of creating new offices or cutting out new work, but of re-distributing existing work and concentrating and fixing responsibility. What was desired was that there should be a Department generally accessible to those interested in agriculture, and that it should be represented in Parliament by some responsible Minister. He did not, on that occasion, appear as the representative of an aggrieved interest, nor to plead for a re-adjustment of burdens as between different descriptions of property. He did not ask the House to charge on the mercantile classes the burdens at present borne by the land, still less did he ask the House to tax the hard earnings of the professional man for the benefit of agriculture. But he asked the House gravely to consider this question—were there, or were there not, in the laws of England as they now stood, or in the relations of those who, in different ways, were connected with landed property, causes which tended to impede the application of capital to the cultivation of the soil? Agriculture in these days was mainly a question of capital; and he asked whether the laws of holding and the tenure of land, the administration of the law, and the powers of various authorities, local or Imperial, tended to hinder the free and secure use of capital in agriculture? He was not aiming at centralization. He had not forgotten the words of the President of the Board of Trade last Session, nor had he forgotten the kind words uttered by the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), in which he warned him that in any plan for promoting a better system of local government, it must be borne in mind that the impulse must come from without. He thought he should not be accused of unduly promoting centralization if he said that the following were legitimate functions for a central authority, namely—first, to remove obstacles to the employment of capital arising from obsolete customs or bad legislation; secondly, to endeavour to protect the weak from having their money spent for them on imprudent outlays, and to prevent the cost of improvident works from being cast upon posterity; thirdly, to collect, test, systematize, and diffuse correct information on agricultural subjects. Only that morning he heard some practical farmers talking of the agricultural statistics laid before the House by the statistical branch of the Board of Trade. They spoke warmly of the use of those statistics, but thought they ought to be more rapidly collected, and brought out as soon as possible after the harvest to be of service to the farmers, whereas, at the time they were now published they only enabled them to guess at what other people were doing with the wheat they had grown. In the fourth place, in cases where they had to struggle against obsolete customs and petty local interests, and where they could not make progress without the concurrence of those locally interested, he thought the State might take the initiative in stimulating local action, and guard against improvident expenditure. Lastly, he thought it a legitimate function for the Executive Government, under the sanction of Parliament, to raise a standard of professional competence for persons intrusted by law with responsible public duties affecting the interests of others. We plumed ourselves on being essentially a practical people, who thought that scientific knowledge was likely to mislead men rather than to be a safe guide to them in the management of their affairs; but those who had reflected upon the sufferings of the lower orders, and had examined into the misery existing among the crowded population of towns, and the scattered population of villages, must feel convinced that it was of the utmost importance that men charged with public responsibility should give some proof of sound education and scientific knowledge. But, supposing an Agricultural Department to have been appointed, it might be asked, what on earth was there for it to do — and what did they want with a Department to help people to do that which they could do better for themselves? He would answer by enumerating five of the subjects which, in his opinion, required the intervention of the best knowledge, guided by the best experience which the country could produce. Some of these were already in action in various branches of the Executive, while others were in their infancy, though, he thought, it would be admitted that they were all subjects which were growing daily in importance. The first related to the exchange and transfer of land, and the improvement of land and cottages. Those who had watched the proceedings of the Commission appointed to inquire into the employment of women and children, and who were aware of the disclosures which would probably result from that investigation, as to the condition of cottages in this country, would admit that he was not now speaking of a subject which was unimportant in itself, or of one which had not been carefully attended to by many proprietors of the soil. It was, however, also true that over a very large proportion of the land in this country cottages were in a very neglected state, and in need of the most careful attention on the part of the Legislature. Many of the duties connected with this subject were already discharged by the Copyhold and Inclosure Commissioners. In the next place, there was the whole question of internal communication in the country. He was not here going to speak directly of railways, although he must repeat, in passing, what he had said last year. His remarks, on that occasion, had since been greatly misrepresented. It had been alleged that he had brought forward a Motion for saddling on the overburdened ratepayers broken-down railways, and branches of railways which did not pay as commercial enterprises. The proposal which he really did make was originally suggested to him by a Conservative county Member, now deceased; and it was to the effect that one of the functions of the projected Department should be to facilitate the construction of railways on a cheaper system than was usually adopted, and to push them into holes and corners of the country where, as ordinary investments, they would not be successful. But what he thought called for early legislation was this,—to bring under some combined system of management the whole of the roads and bridges in the rural districts. In every county there were a number of bridges, with 100 yards of turnpike road on either side of them, under the management of irresponsible Justices of the Peace; then there were the highways, under the supervision of the Highway Board, and then roads under the Turnpike Commissioners. With regard to the bridges, he believed a fearful indictment might be made out against our ancestors by simply printing a map indicating the positions of the county bridges, with reference to the county histories, showing what families were connected with the districts where the bridges had been erected. He understood that the late Secretary of State for the Home Department had contemplated introducing a Bill to establish a uniform system of county management for roads, and he hoped the idea would be carried out by the present Government. There was obviously a great waste of money in consequence of there being three or four systems for the management of roads and bridges, and the aid of Parliament and of a wise and vigorous Executive was required in order to bring about a change in the existing state of things. The third subject to which he would draw attention was the regulation of the cattle traffic. Of course that subject came under two heads, but he referred not so much to the importation of cattle from abroad as to internal traffic. Cattle were frequently sent very long distances, and as a matter of humanity to the animals themselves this was a subject which ought to be no longer neglected. The fourth subject he would refer to was the management of water-courses or river basins on a large scale, with a view to drainage, irrigation, sewage, and the water supply of towns. The latter question, of course, could not be separated from that of the proper use of water in agricultural districts. Fifthly, there was a subject which of itself would have justified him in considering the question he had brought forward; and in regard to this subject he could appeal to the high authority of the right hon. Gentleman who now occupied the Chair, and with whom, in 1847, he was associated in supporting the Bill introduced by Mr. Pusey, Member for Berkshire. For fear of provoking controversy, he would not state by what influences the progress of that measure was impeded. However, it reached a Select Committee, and came out of it with several important provisions, one of which was that the compensation of outgoing tenants should be arranged by two valuers and a third person to be appointed by them; but in the event of their being unable to agree the third person or umpire was to be appointed by the Inclosure Commissioners. Sanctioned by so high an authority, he would suggest as a fifth subject, which might be safely and usefully delegated to a public authority connected with agriculture, the appointment, when called upon by the parties interested, of an independent umpire to secure fair play to both parties in regard to the compensation of outgoing tenants. This was a somewhat delicate subject to touch upon, as the tenant-farmers were not directly represented in that House to any great extent. Many county Members must know very well that the great hindrance to the increase of the production of food in this country was that farmers could not always farm with confidence. They could not look forward more than six months; for though there were counties in which, by a mutual good understanding between the landlord and tenant, many valuable and liberal customs had grown up and considerable confidence existed on each side, yet he regretted to say that that confidence was not felt in other parts of the country. Farmers, following new modes, could not feel secure with less than four years before them. If he were to relate what had come within his own knowledge during the last three months, and were to repeat what had been said to him by many electors as to their reasons for voting in a particular way, hon. Gentlemen would, he thought, admit that this subject was a very important one. The difficulty to be overcome arose from the circumstance that, although some permanent improvements—such as those in fencing or farm-buildings—were capable of precise statement and arithmetical division according to the number of years over which they respectively extended, yet such a test could not be applied to the condition of land and the state of the tillage. There was an element of uncertainty in the question of compensation for crops and manure which must at last call for the services of valuers, and the difficulty was that both the landlord and the tenant-farmer distrusted the men. He felt assured the farmers wished for nothing but justice in the matter, and that the visionary views in that respect which used to be entertained had been abandoned. He hoped, he might add, that the principles which he sought to recommend would not be looked upon as being at variance with ordinary economic action; and now came the question what were the arrangements which would be likely to work best in carrying into effect the objects to which his Motion related. He had very little experience as to the discharge of official duties, but he would mention a plan which had been suggested to him by a gentleman who was intimately acquainted with the subject which he had ventured to bring under the notice of the House. That plan was to unite all that related to health and agriculture under one new Department, to be called the Ministry of Health and Agriculture. Such a scheme was, however, in his opinion, open to the objection of being much too large and too novel to be projected full grown at once before the public mind. He thought it therefore better, on the whole, to look in another direction. A gentleman of very great practical knowledge had informed him that he thought the best thing which could be done was to build on the Inclosure Commission, to expand the duties of that Commission, to concentrate the offices under one head, to bring that head under one of the higher Departments of the Government, and to place in such hands all the duties which might grow up in connection with land. Now, that was a plan which was not, perhaps, very different from the scheme which he would wish himself to propose; for notwithstanding the Motion which had been made by the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) it was, he believed, the fact that the Inclosure Commission still stood upon the Estimates for something like £20,000 a year. It was quite true that a system was growing up, having been set on foot by the Chief Commissioner (Mr. Darby) by which the expense of working that Commission would be thrown on the parties interested, still the charge remained in the Estimates; and between the money which had been voted for the Commission and the future receipts of the Commission there would be abundant money to meet the expense of any Department or branch connected with agriculture which the House might wish to set on foot at the present time. In the Estimates there were expenses amounting to considerably over £100,000 a year for subjects connected with agriculture, and of that amount upwards of £70,000 he thought he found was spent in salaries more or less connected with agriculture. And yet everybody was under the impression that there was no branch of the Government responsible for dealing with agriculture, and no one Office to which farmers could go with confidence for assistance. There were, in his opinion, very strong reasons why the Board of Trade instead of the Privy Council should be looked to to deal with the new duties, and his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade would have felt gratified if he had been behind the scenes that morning and witnessed the proceedings of a sort of farmers' parliament which had been held at the Salisbury Hotel for the purpose of expressing their views on the subject. Among the practical men thus assembled a general disposition had been manifested to look to the right hon. Gentleman and his Department as likely to do for them that which they had so long wanted. After a very searching discussion, the meeting had, he might add, come to the resolution—

“That this Chamber considers it desirable that there should be a separate Government Department for Agriculture, presided over by a permanent officer.”

Now, he thought he might presume to interpret that resolution, which had been unanimously passed in the following way:—The meeting did not, in his opinion, mean by the words “a separate Government Department,” the creation of a new responsible Minister, because the idea of many was that a Minister of Agriculture was not a thing to be thought of for one moment. The words, “a separate Government Department” might, therefore, be fairly construed to mean a distinct branch in a Government Department, while the words “permanent officer” might be regarded as meaning a gentleman of the same intelligence and skill as were known to be possessed by such gentlemen, for instance, as were at the head of the railway and marine branches. The names of Mr. Porter and Mr. M'Gregor had been mentioned at the meeting as having rendered great service to the trade and agriculture of the country in former times. The words “permanent secretary” were employed in the resolution as first proposed, but it was dreaded that if it were adopted in that shape a gentleman might be appointed who would have to go out of Office with the Government of the day, and that agriculture would come to be made a party question, which was looked upon as being likely to prove extremely prejudicial to the agricultural interests. As to whether the subject could be best dealt with by a Committee or a Commission, he would only say that was a question with respect to which he did not desire to press his own views upon the House, and he should be perfectly content to leave the matter, where it should be—in the hands of the Government. He would not offer any general observations on the subject, beyond saying that whatever tended to hinder the application of capital inevitably tended to depress the labouring class, and ultimately to injure the interests of the great landed proprietors of this country. The hon. Gentleman concluded by making the Motion of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the action with reference to Agriculture of various Public Authorities, with a view to consider the expediency of recommending that some one Department be made responsible for dealing with administrative and legislative questions affecting Agriculture.”—(Mr. Acland.)

MR. GOLDNEY said, he had been connected with agriculture for a good many years, but he had that night heard of a good many calamities to agriculture of which he had never heard before. He would not offer any opposition to the Motion if he believed that any practical result was likely to be arrived at by the appointment of such a Committee; but it would be impossible and absurd for any Committee to attempt to deal with one-tenth of the subjects as to which the hon. Member (Mr. Acland) had addressed the House. He had taken down the heads of these subjects as the hon. Member proceeded with his address, and their number and variety were really astonishing. First he was desirous that the relations between landlord and tenant should be settled; then those between country and town parishes; next, that County Financial Boards should be formed not only to grapple with subjects as to which complaints had been made to the House, but upon a still wider basis. Local authorities and magistrates, who at present acted, it was almost alleged, improperly, were to be superseded; and not only they, but Imperial authorities likewise. For instance, the Home Office, the Board of Trade, the Inclosure Commissioners, the Board of Health, the Stationery Office, and several others were to be amalgamated, and their functions transferred to some office of agriculture, which was to possess representation in Parliament. The laws of England also were to be brought under review, more especially those containing clauses affecting the employment of capital and labour; the employment of capital was to be assured; the existing law, which, according to the hon. Member, tended to prevent the investment of capital, being revised with that object, and some system of local government devised under which the money spent by the farmers would be secured to them. “We,” said the hon. Member, “are struggling against local interests.” He did not explain who “we” were, but went on to contend that there should be a standard of computation for valuers. Not content with an enumeration of general subjects, the hon. Member had invited attention to several others having branches which would require attention at the hands of the Committee. His first head, being the general subject of the transfer of land, it branched off into the improvement of land, and the improvement and sanitary arrangements of cottages. Head No. 2 took a wider range, and affected the whole internal communications of the country. There was to be a combined system of management with regard to turnpike roads, county bridges, and so forth. But the hon. Gentleman must know what a time was occupied last year upon one of these subjects alone—that of turnpike roads; and the Home Secretary had now declared his intention not to deal with that question, because it was not yet ripe for legislation. The third head related to the regulation of traffic; the fourth covered the drainage and water supply of the kingdom; while the fifth launched into the matter of compensation to outgoing tenants. This question of compensation was treated as a great grievance, and the hon. Member spoke of the timidity of landlords as a difficulty in the way of its settlement; but the matter settled itself by a valuation between the incoming and the outgoing tenant, and all that the landlord had to do was to hand over the farm from one to the other. How, therefore, there was room for timidity on the landlord’s part he really did not know; and he had never heard of any case of the kind in which, if a difference as to value occurred between the two parties, there had been any difficulty in finding an umpire. Latterly a very general practice had grown up, under which the terms of the letting and holding were stated in writing, and very much simplified matters between the parties. But even that did not satisfy the hon. Gentleman. Not content with an umpire, he sought the intervention of some public body. The hon. Member claimed credit for having shown that a necessity existed for the various measures which he had suggested. He had certainly suggested a great many more than could ever be carried out in any Session of Parliament. It would be far better to take up some one subject and grapple with its difficulties than to launch out into general platitudes affecting the subject of agriculture. He quite agreed with the hon. Member that any grievances affecting the agricultural interest should be redressed, and all he believed that the agricultural interest and those representing it wanted was fair play.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he could not but think that whilst there was much force in what was said by the hon. Member who had just sat down, he still had, to some extent, misapprehended the hon. Gentleman who moved the Motion. He (Sir Stafford Northcote) thought that the object in the statement which had been made, was simply to lay the ground for inquiry as to whether it was desirable to institute a Department that should look to such of these matters as were fit to be attended to by a Department of the Government. Upon that point they were anxious to hear the opinion of the Government; and from his own experience in connection with the Board of Trade, he was satisfied that some improvements in the organization of Government Departments was desirable. There were a great many questions which were now unfortunately distributed between different Departments, such as the Board of Trade, the Home Office, the Privy Council, and various other Departments; and it was an object of considerable administrative importance to see whether some arrangements could be made to bring such matters into a state of greater efficiency; and he hoped that in some form or other the Government itself would agree in the appointment of a Committee. He thought that if they entered into an inquiry they should do so without committing themselves upon the subjects to which he had adverted. He hoped that if they supported this Motion, or gave any encouragement to the opinion that something was required to be done, they would not be held to express any opinion upon the various details to which attention had been drawn. He also hoped that they would not on that occasion be led into a discussion of the merits of the different questions that had been adverted to. His hon. Friend (Mr. Acland) was bound to make a prima facie case in support of his Motion; but in doing so he might possibly have expressed himself in a way which to some hon. Members seemed open to question.

MR. PELL said, that he agreed to a great extent with what had fallen from the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Acland), though he could not go so far as that hon. Member had done. Without going into details, he thought that it would be admitted by everybody who was in any way acquainted with land, that considerable inconvenience, if nothing more, arose from present arrangements as to questions which were of great importance to the owners of land and to agriculturists. At a time of which the House must be sick of hearing, though to agriculturists it was one of terrible trial and suffering, it was with the greatest difficulty that the owners or occupiers of land could ascertain to what Department they were to go for information and relief. They went to a variety of offices, and eventually found themselves among pens, ink, and paper, in some office not far distant from the House of Commons, and connected with the Stationery Department. But, although they were thus shifted from office to office, they did not find that any greater consolation was given to them. As far as he was concerned he thought that the question of the relations of landlord and tenant was far beyond the province of any such inquiry as was now sought for. It appeared to him that the settlement of that question ought to be left to the parties themselves who were immediately interested in it. The House would no doubt agree with him in thinking that the health of the people and the fertility of the soil were intimately connected, and that the main object of legislation in respect to those two points ought to be the getting rid of a vast quantity of matter from towns which was calculated to injure their health, for the purpose of applying it to the land where it would greatly promote agricultural interests. With this subject a Department of State might deal most efficiently, but no private Member could deal with it. If there were, as alleged, tracts of land we should have difficulty in cultivating, there were large tracts of land, well situated with regard to climate and elevation, which remained sterile, because there was no statesmanlike arrangement for utilizing upon them the waste of great cities. In this matter alone there was a greater field of usefulness for a statesman than there was in attempting to interfere in the relations between landlord and tenant.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member who spoke last but one ably pointed out a vast variety of functions which the Motion of the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Acland) contemplated to be discharged by one permanent official. It had been stated, and with truth, that, owing to the fulfilment of the greater part of the work with which the Inclosure Commissioners had been intrusted, that the Commission was approaching the point of dissolution; he (Mr. Newdegate) supposed that their complaints had touched the feelings of the hon. Member for North Devon. And then the hon. Gentleman spoke of the advantages of referring those matters to the Board of Trade. Now, he (Mr. Newdegate) heard a complaint uttered the other day which might also touch the feelings of the hon. Member for Devon—a complaint emanating from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade—namely, that the functions of that Board were purely consultative, and he said that he should be glad to be intrusted with some administrative functions. If the Motion of the hon. Member for North Devon were adopted, the right hon. Gentleman would no longer have occasion to utter such a complaint, inasmuch as he would then have an abundance of active duties to discharge. Although the hon. Gentleman said he did not attempt to establish a central authority, every word he spoke pointed to the establishment of a central authority with a power that would operate in the shape of a direct interference with the ownership and the occupation of land. He (Mr. Newdegate) remembered the Bill to which the hon. Member for North Devon referred as having been introduced by himself with reference to this subject and brought before the House years ago. The result of the consideration of the matter then was that he (Mr. Newdegate) moved for a Committee to inquire into the subjects appertaining to agriculture, inquired into the agricultural customs, the conditions on which land was occupied throughout England and Wales. It was in 1848 the Committee was appointed, and the result of their investigation was a direct recommendation that no specific legislation on the subject should be adopted; for the circumstances of the various localities, of the individuals holding land, and their tenure, was so complex that it was impossible to frame any general law to regulate them. The Committee, however, recommended that every facility should be afforded for carrying out and the giving effect to voluntary agreements which should be made in writing between landlords and tenants, and an alteration of the law with respect to fixtures was made. He was happy to see that since that period the practice of such written and specific agreements was gradually increasing. Those written documents being stamped were legally producible in Courts of Law, and the conditions under which they were given could of course be enforced. These agreements might be made to comprehend, not only buildings if erected by the tenant, nor roads and fences if erected by the tenant, but drainage, if carried out by the tenant, but also the application of manures and certain other processes of cultivation. All the subjects alluded to might thus be comprehended in a written form, and under such an arrangement the relations of landlord and tenant might be certified in such a manner as to prove serviceable to both parties. When the hon. Gentleman said there were impediments to the application of capital for agricultural purposes, he should recollect that the agriculture of this country was in advance of every other country in the world. Although admitting that there remained something still to be done in the way of improvement, surely no one would say that the process by which agricultural interests were advancing so rapidly ought to be interrupted. In Ireland a large proportion of the land had returned to grass. That was the effect of legislation. Years ago the Freetraders had insisted that a larger proportion of the land of this country ought to be devoted to the production of meat, and argued that the supply of fresh meat was far more important than the production of corn. But how was the view of the hon. Member for North Devon to be reconciled with that of those who hold that agriculture in this country was advancing? An hon. Member near him, whom he had had the pleasure of hearing that evening for the first time, called attention to the advantages arising from good supplies of water, and the application of the sewage of towns to the land. He (Mr. Newdegate) would remind him and the House that an hon. Gentleman, a relation of the Speaker, who had proved himself to be as able a public officer as had ever served Her Majesty either at home or abroad, was at that moment engaged in an inquiry upon this subject with the view of recommending such general measures as were material for the promotion of the best interests of the country—for the establishment of out-ports for the main arterial drainage of towns and the conservation of water for the purposes of irrigation. That gentleman was Sir William Denison, who has undertaken to discharge this important task. With respect to the utilization of the sewage and the application of town manure to the land that system was being rapidly carried out in his own immediate neighbourhood with the best result. In the requirements made for the establishment of a central authority in respect to agriculture, it was remarkable the tendency to reaction in the course Parliament was pursuing. There was a tendency to reaction, and it had assumed a curious form; it was a tendency towards Imperialism that was marked in the allusion which the hon. Member for North Devon had made in commendation of the French administration of roads. The House should beware of this Imperialistic tendency towards reaction. He remembered the day when the agricultural interest was congratulated on being liberated from the swaddling-clothes of Protection. It appeared to him that they were trying to envelope agriculture in the swaddling-clothes of official interference. As a county Member who had witnessed the progress of all those improvements in agriculture he could not accept the maternal care of the hon. Member for North Devon. And he should feel much disappointed as to the effects of the Reform Act if he did not find that the interests of the tenant-farmers, aided now by the influence of the £12 occupiers, received due attention in that House. He, however, would warn the tenant-farmers against that interference with their interests which they had seen in the course of the legislation of the last Parliament. He referred especially to the late Act in respect of the Poor Laws, in which powers of taxation were granted to the Poor Law Board, and of interference with the discretion of the Guardians in the appointment of their own officers. Those powers went far to abrogate the principle of self-government and of local taxation. And when the tenant-farmers were asked to subject themselves to that which was in the nature of Imperial official interference, he for one would recommend them to pause and submit the points on which they wished to be governed by law rather than allow it to be supposed that they desired the superintendence of direct, uncontrolled official interference.

LORD HENLEY observed that if a Committee were appointed to consider one of the subjects which had been named—that of roads—much good might result from it. Some counties had their roads under the management of the Highway Boards, while in other counties that was not the case. As far as his experience enabled him to judge he found the Highway Boards worked better than he could have expected them to do; but on the whole he should like to see the system extended so that the minimum area of road management should be the highway district. He believed it would be impossible to have any general measure applicable to all the turnpike roads, but there were a great number of turnpike roads which would soon come on the rates, and the ratepayers would not receive them with satisfaction. The ratepayers were calling for a larger area on which turnpike roads might be charged. Though he would be glad to see turnpikes abolished, he admitted it would be rather hard on small parishes to have to pay the whole expense of turnpike roads. He should wish to see a larger district, whether the highway or the county district. He also thought the subject of bridges in rural districts ought to be taken up by the Committee, as there frequently occurred conflicts between parish and county authorities in respect to the obligation of erecting bridges in places where they were absolutely necessary, but where, in consequence, the erection was indefinitely postponed, to the great inconvenience of the inhabitants in the neighbourhood. The highways, the turnpike roads, and the bridges would afford a Committee ample material for inquiry.

MR. CORRANCE remarked upon the incongruity of the many subjects that had been grouped together by the hon. Member as subjects for inquiry by a Committee. The legislation, he said, which had been effected recently, in respect to agriculture, was of a very haphazard character. At the time of the cattle plague he had been in correspondence with no less than three Departments of the Government on that subject—namely, the Home Office, the Board of Trade, and the Board of Education. From the first Department he received a courteous and official reply; from the second a considerate answer; and from the third such a response as impressed him with the notion that that Board had not much knowledge of the subject upon which it was writing. It appeared to him that they were in want of some distinct and definite Government authority to whom they could apply in all such cases. Some few days ago a Question was asked the Government in that House whether there was not a recent outbreak of the cattle plague in Germany? The answer was, that the Government had no cognizance whatever of such circumstance; but the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster) added that the Dutch Government having received such intelligence had sent a special commission to inquire into the facts. Now, that statement suggested to him (Mr. Corrance) the necessity for the establishment of an authority in this country to take special cognizance of such matters, and to institute a special inquiry into them, as the Dutch Government had done. The hon. Gentleman who introduced this Motion intimated his desire to bring this question of rates under Imperial management. He (Mr. Corrance) trusted that the cost would be provided out of Imperial funds. He confessed he entertained a strong opinion as to the supervision of the Board of Trade in those matters of agriculture—an opinion which was confirmed by what had recently taken place. Some few days ago they had received an assurance from the Head of the Government that the question of local taxation would receive the best consideration of the Government. In a short time afterwards, the President of the Board of Trade, rising in "another place," expressed almost a censure upon his Chief, for what he had said on the subject in this House. The right hon. Gentleman might have some reason to complain of the manner in which his propositions were received in that House; but the hon. Gentleman must admit that episodes of the class to which he had just referred might lead to differences of opinion, even among those who had the same object in view.

LORD F. CAVENDISH said, as he understood it, the sole object of the Motion at present before them was that there should be a Department for agriculture, just the same as there was for trades and manufactures. When Chambers of Commerce met they at once knew what Department of the Government to go to for information, or for what they desired; but persons who required information respecting agriculture had to wander from one Department to another, and thus, many important matters were entirely neglected.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, during the short discussion that has arisen there seem to have been two subjects before the House; one of which has led to a great deal of criticism, and the other of which appears to have been almost entirely forgotten. That which has been much criticized is the speech of the hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Acland); but that which has been for the most part forgotten is the Motion of my hon. Friend, as it appears upon the Paper. Now, I propose to ask the attention of the House to the Motion on the Paper, which is for a

"Select Committee to inquire into the action with reference to Agriculture of various Public Authorities, with a view to consider the expediency of recommending that some one Department be made responsible for dealing with administrative and legislative questions affecting Agriculture."

At first sight this looks not an unreasonable proposition; but if we look to the constitution of the different Departments of the Government, and what is the practice, and, perhaps, the inevitable practice, I think we will find that the Committee of Inquiry sought for will not in all probability attain the results expected from it. Agriculture, in this matter, is exactly in the same position at present as every other interest in the country.

I am not defending that position, but only explaining it. Take, for example, the interest with which I have been more intimately connected—the great cotton trade of Lancashire. The Factory Acts are under the Home Office. An Act was passed last year for collecting cotton statistics under the Board of Trade, and so you might go through almost all the interests of the country, and find that for some things you come to the Board of Trade for information; and for certain other things you come to the Home Office. I am not about to say that that is a good state of things; for in all probability some have an inconvenience, and some have a difficulty and a circumlocution with regard to these things that might possibly be avoided; but I doubt very much whether a Committee will be the best means of attaining what is desired, because I presume the Committee would take evidence from the heads of the different Departments—it may be conflicting evidence, and in the end the Committee may not be able to come to a conclusion so satisfactory to the House and the country as a conclusion arrived at by consultation and consideration by the heads of Departments themselves. I will not go over all the points of my hon. Friend's speech which has been criticized, it seems to me, I will not say with indifference, but certainly with no great desire to comprehend what he was driving at. It is quite obvious that my hon. Friend did not in the least intend that all those subjects which he mentioned should be referred to the Committee; but he thought that if there was one Department of Government to which persons connected with land and agriculture might apply, there were occasions with regard to nearly all those questions on which application might be made to that Department, and that advice and assistance some way or other should be rendered. That is a very fair proposition. I thought he included questions in his speech, respecting which, if I was at the head of such a Department, I should not like to come before me. I listened to the string of subjects which he referred to, and after dealing at length with the question of the transfer, and exchange, and improvement of land and cottages; with the question of internal communication; with the question of the cattle traffic, and the cause of humanity as connected with that traffic; with the questions of sheds, drainage, and irrigation; and, after speaking at some length on what, in the presence of hon. Gentlemen opposite, he evidently felt to be very delicate ground—tenant-right and confidence of tenants in their landlords—I listened for a moment and expected him to turn to the Board of Trade and ask them to propose some regulation on the subject of game, and it is not unreasonable that he should have sent any one to that Department. Now, I have here a card which I found in the office. It relates to six important Departments, and the various heads of those Departments number no fewer than fifty-seven. The Commercial Department is under eleven, the Railway Department under seven, the Harbour Department under seven, the Marine Department under twenty-one, the Financial Department under ten, and the Statistical Department under only one, which is not subdivided. With regard to the latter, I am sorry to say, it is not so satisfactorily managed as it might be, and it is intended to put it into such a condition as I think will enable it to furnish more correct and speedy statistics to the country. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department is of opinion, and I suspect that the heads of all the other Departments who have had to do with home affairs are of opinion, that there might be some improvement—that some things might be taken from the Board of Trade to the Home Office, and some from the Home Office to the Board of Trade. It would, no doubt, be of advantage to have some plan by which any one coming from the country would have to ask for only one office instead of running the risk of losing his way as he passed down Whitehall. But trade and agriculture are in this matter precisely on the same footing. It is not, therefore, a question for the farmers to take an especial interest in. My own advice to them would be to come as little as possible to any Government office. My hon. Friend said in his speech what was very gratifying for me to hear, that the gentlemen with whom he has been holding a small parliament this morning—indeed, I would venture to call it a matter of great importance—had great confidence in me, and hinted that they regarded my present position as a very satisfactory one. I take hon. Gentlemen opposite to witness whether, looking to the past, I did not do to the best of my ability that which was highly advantageous to agriculture. I recollect a county Member who has retired from this House telling me more than once that he thought I had been the best friend of agriculture he knew of, although during the whole of that time I was engaged in those labours he was one of my staunchest opponents. I think agriculture had never less cause to complain than at present. The landlords never had better rents nor the rents more punctually paid than at the present time; and I think that the prospects of agriculture as regards the farmers are very satisfactory. When I found my hon. Friend had put this Motion on the Paper and also that one had been given notice of by another hon. Member on the subject of local taxation, I could not help remembering a story an eminent physician once told me. He said he was sent for very hastily one morning to attend a lady of rank, who wished instantly to consult him. When he called on her she said she felt very well—that she never had been that she knew of better in her life—certainly she had not been so well for many years—but she told him she had sent for him because she felt satisfied something was going to happen to her. Now, that is just about the condition of agriculture. She never was so well in all her life, yet she is about to call in the House of Commons, the Board of Trade, and I know not what, to help her under an apprehension that something is about to happen. I, however, advise hon. Gentlemen, the friends of the farmers, and the farmers themselves, to look to agriculture, and to consider that the sun and showers and industry are better for them than anything the House of Commons or Government Departments can do for it. With regard to the particular Motion before the House, I think, when I tell my hon. Friend that at this moment my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department is considering whether it is not possible to make some—I will not say any considerable—but certainly some not unimportant changes in the direction to which his Motion refers—that it will be attempted to bring things that are in some degree alike and connected into one office in order that there may not be that running about to two or three offices that the hon. Gentleman opposite spoke of—I think he will consider that it is not necessary to press this Motion for the appointment of a Committee. There is no disposition on my part, and there is none on the part of the Government, to resist an inquiry which would be probably attended with useful results, and least of all is there any disposition to resist such an inquiry in the case of an interest which is so powerfully represented on both sides of this House. For myself and for my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, I can say that the question, so far as I have indicated, shall be considered, and if it appears that we can discover anything that bids fair to secure this result—and I think there are things that may be discovered in the direction of the Motion of my hon. Friend—it shall as far as possible be carried out, and probably the objects of his Notice and of his speech may be accomplished without the appointment of the Committee for which he has asked.

MR. ACLAND said, he felt much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the clear view in which he had presented the subject. His only objects were to obtain an inquiry in the most effectual manner, and, after the promise made on behalf of the Government, he thought it unnecessary to press his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT (1867) AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to amend "The Representation of the People Act, 1867," said, he proposed to defer the discussion of its details until the second reading, when it would be for the House to accept or reject the measure. The first part of the Bill proposed to repeal the 7th section of "The Representation of the People Act (1867)," which abolished the system of compounding; and the second part proposed to repeal the fourth paragraph of the 3rd section, and the fourth paragraph of the 6th section of the same Act, which rendered compulsory the personal payment of rates, and decided what should be the rating qualification of a voter. The Bill provided that a person should retain his right to vote whether his rates had been paid or not, leaving the rates to be recovered in the ordinary manner. It might be said that a private Member of the House had hardly a right to submit to it a question of such great importance; but he felt that, if no other Member took it up, this was a duty from which he could not shrink. So much oppression and injustice had rarely been produced by any one measure as were traceable to the working of the new law of rating, and many Members of that House were well aware of the deep feeling of irritation and discontent which it had created, and were pledged to assist in the removal of the grievance. The public voice had long been loud and universal in condemning the obnoxious ratepaying clauses of the original Reform Act, but the vexation and suffering created were now increased ten-fold. The Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) would not settle this question. That was entirely a theoretical measure, which it was hoped would prove useful, but his Bill was eminently practical, and he hoped the House would not hesitate to allow of its introduction. The hon. Member concluded by moving for Leave to introduce a Bill to amend "The Representation of the People Act, 1867."

MR. LOCKE KING said, that with the title which the hon. Member's Bill bore he might bring almost every fish into his net—extend the franchise, alter the re-distribution of seats, and do other things by which the House might be taken by surprise. This was a dangerous precedent, and it would be better to confine the Bill to the repeal of certain specified Acts.

MR. GLADSTONE: The question before us is a very simple one, and I shall only have occasion to trouble the House with three or four sentences. I must, in the first place, demur to the statement of the hon. Gentleman with regard to the practice of the House. He appears to think that the House is almost bound to permit the introduction of a Bill and its first reading. I do not accept that view of our practice. At the same time the hon. Gentleman may fairly ask us to accede to the Motion he has just made, and there is no occasion for the apology he made, with great modesty, for undertaking to legislate upon this question. It so happens that the enactment of these clauses was the work of an independent Member (Mr. Hodgkinson), and every Member of this House, especially one representing a large constituency, is perfectly justified, apart from criticism upon the mere terms of his Motion, in asking the House to assent to what he thinks the best mode of remedying the existing evil. The state of the case between the hon. Member and the Government is this—We are agreed that considerable inconvenience and hardship are caused by the undesigned operation of certain clauses in the Reform Act. We are also agreed that a remedy must be applied. The Government have considered what description of remedy, all circumstances taken together, was likely to be the most easy in its application, and the most convenient and satisfactory to the House at large. For that purpose my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) has laid a Bill upon the table which has been circulated among Members to-day. The hon. Member proposes to adopt another method, which is certainly more direct, though whether it is equally satisfactory in regard to economic consequences and practical enfranchisement will be a question for consideration hereafter. He proposes, however, another remedy for the same grievance. Now, it would ill become us, who have obtained leave to submit our plan to the House, to grudge to any other Member the opportunity of submitting his plan as well. It will, on the contrary, be of advantage that the Bill of the hon. Member should be printed and circulated, because, ample time being allowed for the consideration of these two methods of dealing with the subject, it would be well to know the impression which they make in the country. All I desire is that nothing should be said or done unnecessarily to revive the warm feelings which arose upon the original discussion of this subject, and with this remark I gladly accede to the Motion for leave to introduce the Bill.

MR. HIBBERT, having taken considerable interest in the compounder, hoped that that being had been quietly laid at rest. He regretted the prospect of revived feelings which had been raised by the discussion of 1867, and thought the plan of the hon. Member was much more objectionable than that of the Government. The measure introduced by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) did him great credit. No doubt, if great hardships were inflicted in the collection of the rates from the occupiers of small houses, some remedy ought to be applied, but it ought to be applied so as not entirely to undo the legislation of 1867. Entertaining this view, he should feel bound at some future stage to oppose the Bill of the hon. Member.

Mr. H. B. Sheridan

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend "The Representation of the People Act, 1867," ordered to be brought in by Mr. HENRY B. SHERIDAN and Mr. GOURLEY.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. CRAUFURD, in rising to move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Poor Law in Scotland; and whether and what amendments should be made therein, said, so far as regarded England, the question of the Poor Law was one of very ancient date; but so far as Scotland was concerned the question was one of exceedingly modern and recent times. They had, no doubt, a law in Scotland passed in the latter part of the 16th century, and regulated by ordinances of the Privy Council, which dealt with the question of the maintenance of the poor; and he would say that in his opinion—and he hoped he might not be supposed to boast too much of the advantages of the laws of the country from which he came—the principles upon which that ancient Poor Law was founded were principles which he thought were eminently calculated to meet the question of the maintenance of the poor, and were principles which were rational and beneficial, socially and generally, to the country. The principle upon which the Poor Law in Scotland was regulated was this, that it was the duty of every man according to his means to provide for the permanently disabled poor, who from infirmity were unable to work for themselves, who had no means of subsistence, and who had no relations whom the law held bound to provide for them. It was, in fact, a rate in aid of poverty, and not a Poor Law rate. Down to the year 1843 that was the general principle upon which the poor of Scotland were maintained; and he asserted now, without fear of contradiction, that the principle upon which that law was based and administered was one well adapted to provide for the maintenance of the indigent and the incapable, and was also one eminently calculated to preserve and foster those relations of charity and affection without which the social fabric cannot properly be maintained. It was held to be the duty of the relatives of a poor person to maintain him, and it was only where the means of those relatives were insufficient to enable them to fulfil the duty imposed upon them by law, that the law stepped in and called upon those who were wealthy, and consequently able, to supplement the disabilities under which the relations found themselves. Hence came the basis of their rating—a rating upon the means and substance of a person, and not a rating upon the income; for he was called upon to contribute, not necessarily in exact proportion to his income, but according to his position, and to the wealth he held in the country. Unfortunately, as population and trade increased, pauperism increased also, and the means were not managed in a manner adequate to supply the necessities of the poor. There came a time of great distress, when a question with regard to the support of the able-bodied poor appeared to be looming before the public. There were also the large evictions in Sutherlandshire, driving numbers of people from their accustomed means of occupation. A Royal Commission was appointed to take evidence as to the state of the poor, and as to the means best adapted to remedy the great distress then existing. The Commission reported in 1844, and in 1845 a Bill was brought in under the Government of Sir Robert Peel, which was based on the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners. That body, however, were not quite unanimous—one of the Commissioners having sent in his reasons for dissenting from the Report of his brother Commissioners, and if he recollected rightly, the Gentleman who thus dissented was the only English Member of the Commission. When the second reading of the Bill came to be taken, a strong resistance and opposition to it was made by the Scotch Members. They objected to the principle upon which it was based, but they principally objected to the proposed establishment of a Board of Supervision at Edinburgh. Mr. Rutherford, afterwards Lord Rutherford, also most strenuously opposed the proposal to appoint that Board. It was resisted on all sides, he believed almost unanimously, by the Scotch Members of the House. [SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE: No!] Hishon.

Friend the Member for North Lanarkshire appeared to dissent. He would find he (Mr. Craufurd) was right if he referred to the debates of that day in Hansard.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE was understood to say that he himself supported the Bill.

MR. CRAUFURD recollected his hon. Friend did support it, but actually the main body of the Scotch Members objected to the Bill. But, as often happened, when a Government had at its back an arrogant majority, they protested and protested in vain. They foretold all the evils that would arise from that legislation, and he believed that every one of the evils had come to pass. First of all, he would take the expenditure at the time when the Bill was passed, or shortly afterwards. He would take the first reliable Return. In the year 1845 the total expenditure for the poor in Scotland amounted to £295,000. It might be said that at that time the poor in Scotland were very badly treated; but the expenditure had gone on increasing in a rapidly extending ratio. Within a very few years it reached nearly double the amount he had named, and according to the last Report of the Board of Supervision the expenditure of the Poor Law in the year ending 14th May, 1868, was no less than £863,000. He would not grudge that money if he thought that the poor in 1868 were proportionately better off in a ratio corresponding to the immense increase that had taken place in the expenditure; but he asserted, and he fully believed that he should be able to prove it if he obtained the Committee, that while the expenditure had been increasing in that enormous ratio, the poor were no better off practically than they were in 1845. He would take, as an instance, the case of his own small country parish. At the time of the passing of the Act the population was 2,000. It was now something like 200 short of that. In 1845, the registered poor upon the roll numbered forty; their maintenance, the voluntary care of the proprietors of the parish, cost between £200 and £300 per annum; and the poor in those days were exceedingly well off. They often had allowances amounting to 3s. or 4s. per week. The cost of the poor in that parish was now altogether nearly £700 a year. The number of them was doubled, if not more, and they only received wretched

doles of 1s. or 1s. 6d. per week, or 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. in cases where there were three or four dependent on them. Nor did that mark the whole difference as compared with 1845. Before the passing of the Act, it was well known that the poor received numerous assistances from the hand of charity, aided by the contributions of meal from farmers in the district; and it was also notorious that at that time in Scotland the relations maintained their own poor, and made it a matter of pride to do so, so that they would almost starve themselves rather than allow their relations to come upon the Poor Roll. All that was now changed. The legal rate, which the poor considered they had the right to come upon, had buttoned up the pocket of charity, and had destroyed the feelings of affection and of mutual relationship, and had dried up all those feelings and habits which knit together in kindly union the different members of a community. The poor were now left to fight their way as they best could, instead of being able to rely upon mutual friendship and on assistance from those above them. This had given rise to relations of determined warfare between rich and poor—the poor claiming as a right, relief, no matter how improvident they might have been, how drunken, how dissipated. No matter how entirely their distress might be owing to their own wilful folly and idleness, they claimed, in spite of that, the right to assistance; while the rich, on the other hand, resisted claims founded upon no proper moral consideration whatever. The law had been in operation for upwards of a quarter of a century; and he thought that it was enough for him to state these broad facts to justify him in asking the Government to grant the Committee of Inquiry into the whole system of the Poor Law of Scotland. Only eight years after the Act was passed, Sir John M'Neill went to Caithness and examined the state of things there, and if any Member would turn to the Report of the Board of Supervision in 1853, he would find an interesting account of the result of that investigation. Sir John stated distinctly that the consequence of that law had been to destroy all principle of independence, and to pauperize the country, and to create all those evils which it ought to have avoided. A recent Report had also been issued by a very intelligent

Committee of Investigation of the Wick Board, and he understood that Report had been generally endorsed by the counties and parishes in Scotland as to the points in which remedy was sought. Now there were three questions which appeared to him must be carefully investigated. One was the principle of extending the area of chargeability; and he hoped that, having felt the advantage of adopting such a system in England, they should not be refused it in Scotland. Another was to abolish, or to largely modify the law of settlement—a result which would follow the enlargement of the area of assessment. Whether the area of chargeability should be extended to the union or to the county was a matter upon which he would not pass an opinion until he heard the evidence which might be adduced before the Committee. There might be difficulties in extending the area to the counties, because some of them were divided into districts. For instance, his own county of Ayr was divided into three districts. However that was a matter of detail; and what he wanted to arrive at was an enlarged area of chargeability. Yesterday, he received a paper containing information respecting several parishes in one county, and the writer enumerated nineteen parishes, the percentage of taxation upon which varied no less than from £1 6s. to £8. And that was all in one county. Such a state of things was highly to be deprecated, and it called loudly for relief. There was a Return lying upon the table of the House, moved for by himself a year or two ago, showing distinctly the rates which were levied in the various parishes throughout Scotland, and although those rates varied as much as from 5d. or 6d. in the pound to 2s. 6d. and 3s., it would be seen that the whole average of the country amounted to something like 1s. 2d. in the pound. There was also another point which he desired the Committee to direct their attention to, and that was the restoration to Scotland of its old and recognized principle that every man should contribute to the sustenance of the poor according to his means. Why was the landed proprietor, or, more than that, the poor householder in the towns and country villages, to be taxed until he himself was brought into pauperism, while the rich money-lender who had the mortgages upon that land was to escape scot-free. He might be told there were difficulties in the matter, and that they must go to a national rate. Well, if they were to go to a national rate, he saw no difficulties in the matter. He thought the support of the poor was a national, and not a local matter. It was by making it local that they had created all those inequalities and questions with regard to the law of settlement. It was all very well so long as the great staple of income was the land, and the land was the only thing which could bear the support of the poor; but since those days they had the large manufacturing interests, who, instead of gathering together their twenty or thirty labourers, bring together thousands of men who, when a mishap occurred in trade, might be turned upon the streets, not upon the men who brought them together, but upon the land. No one felt more strongly upon the subject than his own constituents, and he trusted that the Lord Advocate, who he understood was to grant the Committee, would not limit the scope of their inquiry. He wanted a thorough, entire, and radical inquiry into the whole working of the system. Do not let the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell him that he would give him a partial inquiry into some of the points, and refuse inquiry as regarded the others. He would rather not have an inquiry at all if it was to be but a partial one. He wanted such an inquiry into the causes of pauperism and the principles of the Poor Law as would settle whether they could not have something like the old law of Scotland, which would restore to them that independence of character which was once their pride and glory in that matter. He was told, but he hoped that it was not true, that he was to be denied inquiry into the Board of Supervision. Now let him ask—Of what does that Board consist? There was upon it the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, the Lord Provost of Glasgow, three Sheriffs depute or county Judges, the Solicitor General for Scotland, and three members appointed by the Crown—one of whom was a paid Chairman. They had Reports annually from that Board, but what were they? They gave them statistical Returns of the number of poor, of the expenditure upon them, and other details of that kind, and, to a certain extent, the operation of the Act; but they had no minutes of their meetings, and knew nothing of what they did or how they did it, and they believed, as always was the case where there was only one paid member of a committee, that that paid member was the supreme ruler of the entire Board. Now amongst other things which he ought to mention was the enormous increase which had taken place in the amount necessary for the maintenance of the poor in Scotland, and one of those items was the item of management. That had risen in the last Report to no less than £94,000 per year. It had, in fact, crept up regularly year by year from £17,000, which was the sum at which it stood in 1845. He knew not whether that sum included the Board of Supervision, but he did think that it ought to be reduced, because at that rate it would soon reach no less than £200,000 a year. Therefore he said they ought to have a change in the constitution of that Board, unless it could come before the Committee and prove that what it did was more for good than evil. He entertained what was a very strong feeling throughout Scotland in respect to what were called Edinburgh Boards. There was no representation upon that Board. The Lord Advocate was not a member of it, although it did happen that the Solicitor General, who was a member of it, was also a Member of that House; but there was no fixed representation upon it, and no certainty of representation. The whole principle of it was that of a central irresponsible body, whose decisions after they were given, he believed, often produced dissatisfaction throughout Scotland. It might be, when they came before the Committee, they might satisfy them that, although in certain cases they might create hardships, yet upon the whole their action had been just or justifiable; but if they refused to come before the Committee, upon them would be the accusation that they dared not come to explain their conduct. The hon. Member concluded by moving—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Poor Law in Scotland; and whether any and what amendments should be made therein.”—(Mr. Craufurd.)

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he must congratulate his hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) on the able manner in which he had brought the subject under the notice of the House. He most cordially endorsed all that he had said as to the necessity of some action being taken in the matter. The question was one that had taken a great hold on the mind of the people of Scotland, and he could fully bear out his hon. Friend in his statement that the people of that country would not be satisfied with any partial or incomplete inquiry. He himself was distinctly of opinion that they ought not to be satisfied with anything else than the fullest and most searching inquiry. His hon. Friend might possibly be labouring under a misconception when he said that he believed the learned Lord Advocate would limit the inquiry so far as details were concerned. Should the learned Lord Advocate do so, he (Sir Robert Anstruther) had no doubt it would be upon the ground that it would be tantamount to passing a Vote of Censure upon the Board of Supervision to compel them to appear before a Committee; but he, for his part, could not see the force of any objection to an open inquiry. If the Board of Supervision conducted its affairs satisfactorily—if the sum of money it expended upon the management of the poor was not extravagant—if there be nothing to hide from the Committee—why, then, he asked should there be any objection to appear before that Committee? Their refusal to appear would certainly look suspicious; and should the learned Lord Advocate refuse to command them to appear, it would look very like as if there was something to conceal. He made no charge against the Board of Supervision; he only stated a fact when he said that there was a strong feeling in Scotland that the affairs of the poor were not satisfactorily managed by that Board. The increase in the expense of management during the last twenty-five years was something enormous. In the year 1853 it was only £67,000; but in 1868 it had risen to between £94,000 and £95,000. That such was the case, was, he thought, quite sufficient ground for demanding that the inquiry should be full and radical. The various points raised by the hon. Member for Ayr were most interesting, and he thought the thanks not only of the Scotch Members but of the House were due to him for the manner in which he had brought the subject before them. He earnestly hoped that the Government would not only grant inquiry, but would allow that inquiry to be as full and complete as possible.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he could not allow the remarks of his hon. Friend (Mr. Craufurd) to pass without notice. He was sure that if the House did agree to the large and expensive inquiry the hon. Gentleman had proposed it would do so in a very different spirit to that which he had displayed in his speech. He desired to bear his tribute to the immense benefit which the present law had conferred both upon the poor and upon the property of Scotland. He had not taken the trouble to refer to the proceedings of Parliament when it passed that measure, but he could at least bear testimony to the fact that it had not been passed with undue haste. Looking at the history of the measure, he thought it had been one of a most beneficial kind, whilst much of the distrust with which it was received had been dispelled by the moderation with which the law had been carried out, and the sound working of the administration in large parts of the country. He could not help feeling surprise that after the disclosures in the Report upon which that Act was founded—disclosures of the starvation of the peasantry of the country in many cases, and of their entire dependence upon the most precarious sources of relief—his hon. Friend should still speak boldly of his wish to recall the system under which those things had taken place. He must surely have forgotten, to give one instance only out of many—the very different footing upon which the lunatics of Scotland were now placed to that which they occupied before the passing of the present Act. He should, above all things, deprecate the institution of an inquiry by that House, under the apprehension, conveyed by any Member of it, that there was any disposition on the part of the Legislature to undo the work which was then accomplished. He would not attempt to deny that evils existed, but they were not so great as were attempted to be made out. He, for his part, did not deprecate inquiry into that subject; but he thought the subjects of inquiry should, first of all, be distinctly named and understood. He had no desire to exclude the Board of Supervision from that inquiry. He thought, moreover, that some of the things mentioned by the hon. Member for Ayr were well worthy of consideration. It was a difficult subject, however, to decide whether rating should be confined to house property or to land, but that was also a proper question for inquiry. He thought, however, that the House should not enter upon an inquiry without having clear and practical views as to what it wished to accomplish. Should the Motion be agreed to, however, he hoped the hon. Member would re-model the constitution of the Committee. He observed that the hon. Member proposed that that Committee should be largely composed of the junior Members of Scotland, many of whom were quite new to that House. That, he thought, was a mistake, and he hoped some of the senior Members, such as the representatives of Kilmarnock and Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho and Mr. Bouverie) would be added to the Committee.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART, having been Chairman of the Poor Law Board of Scotland before he entered that House, hoped he might be permitted to say that for some time he had seen with pain and regret the abuses that were daily growing up under the administration of the Poor Law, and which required the serious investigation of the House; and he thought that the operations of the Board of Supervision ought to be inquired into.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he quite agreed with what had fallen from several hon. Members who had just spoken, that the very greatest possible interest was felt in Scotland on that question. No topic seemed to have taken firmer hold of the public mind in that country than that had. At the same time, he was bound to say that, so far as his experience had gone, it was rather in regard to the area of chargeability than to any other point that inquiry was needful. The present system threw a great burden upon the city which he represented, being the centre of a great agricultural county, which needed at times all the surplus labour the town could afford; but when out of work the chargeability of the labourers had to be borne, not by the rates of the place in which they had earned their living, but they were brought into the town, and thus became chargeable on the town rates, which was felt to be an intolerable grievance. He could only say that, although his experience had not been as great in the matter as that of his hon. Friend, he considered him quite justified in asking the learned Lord to grant a Committee. At the same time he must add, that, in his opinion, there would be plenty of time and opportunity afforded after the Committee was appointed to extend the subjects of inquiry. It would therefore, he thought, be wise on the part of his hon. Friend not to lose the opportunity of obtaining a Committee on the subject that Session, even although the Lord Advocate might be of opinion that it ought to be more limited in its scope than his hon. Friend had wished. And he would also remind his hon. Friend that there would not be too much time that Session to expend on such an inquiry, and therefore that it would be very unwise to object to it, unless it was to go to the fullest extent which he desired.

LORD ELCHO said, he could not but express an earnest hope that the learned Lord Advocate would grant that Committee. His hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) expressed himself in the strongest and most forcible manner with respect to the evils attending the present system. For his own part he could not speak except with respect to the feeling in his own county, and there had been undoubtedly an unmistakable feeling expressed with regard to the existing evils under the present Poor Law system in Scotland. His hon. Friend had pointed out very clearly that it was not so much a question affecting the bulk of the population as that very large number of persons who were only just able to keep their heads above water, and who were in imminent danger of being submerged in consequence of the burden of the rates. His hon. Friend had stated to the House that the expenses of management had reached the large sum of £94,000. Surely that was one good ground why there should be a searching inquiry. Another good ground was that the present system operated very injuriously to the poor themselves. That fact had been very forcibly put before him by a gentleman of Edinburgh, Mr. Currer, and he fully confirmed what had so well been put forward by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Craufurd), that the existing system had a most demoralizing effect upon the recipients of the rates. He (Lord Elcho) quite admitted that some legal provision for the relief of the poor in Scotland as well as in other parts of the kingdom was necessary, but, at the same time, it ought to be administered in such a manner as to maintain, as far as possible, that spirit of independence which formerly existed in that country, but which, he grieved to say, had been, to say the least, compromised by the existing system. Formerly, the poor of that country spared no pains or labour to support their poor relations; but now he was told by those who were conversant with the subject that that spirit was in a great measure dead. There was, indeed, he was informed, a complete change in that respect, and that now, instead of making efforts to support their poor relations, their sole object was to get them off their hands and on to the rates. At the same time, he did not attribute all those evils to the administration of the Board of Supervision. He had the pleasure of being well acquainted with Sir John M'Neill, the President of the Board, who had always shown himself a most able administrator, and a first-rate man of business in every sense of the word. At the same time, he hoped that his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate would not limit the inquiry on the ground that there had been any exaggeration on the part of the hon. Member for Ayr; because if his hon. Friend had exaggerated any part of his statement, which he (Lord Elcho) did not say, the inquiry would prove that he was wrong; whereas, on the other hand, if it was limited, people would be sure to say that there must have been something which the Board of Supervision were afraid to have inquired into, and the statements were founded on correct information.

MR. M'LAREN said, he most cordially approved of the Motion which had been made for the fullest possible inquiry into that subject. So far as he knew, his hon. Friend had made no exaggerated statement whatever. On the contrary, he (Mr. M'Laren) believed that he had understated the facts and the evils which had arisen under the operation of the Act of 1847. If he went back for ten years previously to that date, he could tell them a most remarkable fact. In 1837, the whole amount which was expended in Scotland on poor rates was £180,000 odd. He forgot the exact figures. He did not know that the Motion was likely to be opposed, and he had not intended to speak on the subject. It was now nearly £900,000. In point of fact within that short period of thirty-one years it had increased about 500 per cent. If that was not a startling thing he did not know what was. From the Report of the Poor Law Board, issued three weeks ago, he saw that there were about 350,000 people in Scotland last year receiving parochial assistance—that was to say, either as actual regular recipients of poor relief, as casual paupers, or as the children of those classes, out of a population of 3,100,000, so that, in that year, every ninth person in Scotland received assistance out of the poor rates. If that was not a startling fact, and one which deserved the most serious consideration of that House, he did not know what was. He would not put it merely as a question of money—he would put it on far higher; he would put it on moral grounds. The present system was destroying the independence and the spirit of the Scotch people. The national character was being deteriorated by the present system of Poor Law relief. He held, and many people who had seen it and who were far better acquainted with its effects than he was held, that the present system of administration of the Poor Law was one great means of that deterioration. It was, therefore, the duty of that House to inquire into the facts of the case. A remark was made in order to disparage the effect of the statements which had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) to the effect that he had selected the junior Scotch Members instead of the senior to be Members of that Committee. It was almost too trifling a matter to notice, but he (Mr. M'Laren) might say that his hon. Friend did him the honour to ask him to be a Member of the Committee, but having been pretty hard worked for the last three years, he suggested whether it would not be right that his junior Colleague should work for the next year. His hon. Friend assented, and accordingly he asked his Colleague, who had far more experience in that particular branch of social economy than he (Mr. M'Laren) had, having been the Chairman of a Poor Law Board, and his Colleague had kindly assented. He thought that that statement was quite sufficient to remove any impression which had been created by the remark, that by selecting only the junior Members his hon. Friend had the intention of making what was generally termed a “packed Committee,” in order to arrive at any special results which he might desire. If his hon. Friend had any intention of reverting to the old method of means and substance assessment, he was dead against him as to that question; but he had not stated in his resolution that such was his intention; and certainly they were entitled to inquire—having the administration of the Poor Law on the system that now existed—whether that system was not capable of being improved. If it was, no doubt the Committee would find out what was the best remedy under all the circumstances of the case. But, at all events, he believed it would be found quite impossible to go on without extending the area of rating. A system had come into operation in Scotland, partly from the state of the Poor Laws, and partly from the Game Laws, that wherever a cottage in the country districts could be knocked down it was done; and go where they would, the inhabitants could find no other house open to them in the district. The effect of that was no doubt to clear the country, and in almost every district in Scotland the labourers thus removed were forced into towns. The result was that, in thousands of cases, the labouring men in Scotland were obliged to go from the towns into the country districts to work in the morning, walking four or five miles, and returning a similar distance in the evening. And, moreover, when they did return, they were, in many cases, obliged to live in tenements which were hardly fit for pigs to live in. And all this arose from the fear that, if cottages were erected in the agricultural districts, the sons and the husbands would shoot game, or kill the fish, and partly from the fear of their becoming chargeable upon the poor rates of the parish; so that it was thought far better to get rid of them at once, and to drive them to the towns, where they were placed upon the towns' poor rate. He (Mr. M'Laren) thought that that was one strong ground for inquiring into the present state of things. His hon. Friend the Member for Ayr made some reference to the Board of Supervision, and also to the discussion which took place in Scotland when the Act authorizing the establishment of that Board was passed. He would not go into that question at the present moment; but he did happen to know something of the Board of Supervision. His hon. Friend had named the members of that Board, and among them he mentioned the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, the Lord Provost of Glasgow, and three Sheriffs depute. Now, he (Mr. M'Laren) held the first-mentioned office for three years, and had an opportunity of attending the Board of Supervision, and therefore he thought he might say that he knew just as much as it was needful to know of it; and he could state that the whole business of that Board was practically done by the Chairman and the Secretary, and that it could be done just as well if no other members of the Board were present. In the Act which had been alluded to there was a clause which enabled the Government to pay £100 a year to each of three legal gentlemen in Edinburgh, and the three Sheriffs are named in the Act—the Sheriff of Perth, the Sheriff of Renfrew, and the Sheriff of Ross. It was expected that they would attend for £100 a year. In the last year that allowance was increased to £150 a year. If those gentlemen were to attend fifteen meetings a year, they would thus receive at the rate of ten pounds for each meeting, and he really doubted whether their attendance was worth ten pence, for the business was practically arranged and settled before the meeting of the Board was held, and there was really nothing to do but to adopt the suggestions of the Secretary and Chairman of the Board. Then there was a swarm of clerks, inspectors, and people connected with the Board, whom the Government paid, and it also gave £10,000 a year for medical aid, which did not appear in those local accounts. They had thus the whole of the expenses of the Central Board paid by the Government, and over and above all those circumstances it seemed to him that if an inquiry was to take place at all the inquiry must embrace the Board of Supervision, and in his opinion that was one of the most important points upon which an inquiry was necessary. He could dwell upon that subject for a considerable length of time; but he would not further occupy the time of the House, because he took it for granted that Her Majesty's Government would not seek to limit that inquiry, being convinced that nothing but a full inquiry would give satisfaction to the people of Scotland.

MR. DYCE NICOL said, that having just heard the experience of the Member for Edinburgh, as Chairman of a parochial Board in that town, he ventured to state his opinion, as serving in a similar capacity in a rural district, which was entirely confirmatory of that expressed by the hon. Member for North Lanarkshire: he considered that, on the whole, the operation of the Poor Law in Scotland was satisfactory; at the same time there was no subject more deserving of a full and searching inquiry. The principal grievance now felt arose from the enormous expense of litigation as to settlement; the consideration of which had been urged on the authorities for several years, but they had been unable to propose any measure likely to prove an effectual remedy. The unequal pressure of the rates is now prominently brought forward, and with reference to that alluded to by the hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs, as existing in the county he had the honour to represent, and to the letter which he had received on the subject from Mr. Scott, of Brotherton, he had to explain that that gentleman's residence had on each side of it a fishing village, and from such a population the claims for relief were likely to be large. On his own property, in the northern portion of the county, he had also two fishing villages, which of course increased the poor's rate; but much depended on the prudent and watchful management of the Board and Inspector, and in that respect there was a wide difference in many parishes. The subject of the increase of the area of chargeability should be approached with caution, for although several of the most experienced heads of the English Poor Law Board had expressed strong opinions on it, they had only been able to carry, three years ago, after much opposition, the Union Chargeability Bill. The selection of members for the proposed Committee composed of Gentlemen of well-known ability for any inquiry of importance, he, however, feared would leave an impression on the public that there was too much of the town element in it—the county Members proposed, chiefly representing counties with large villages, and the great mineral districts of Scotland, where the rate was heavy, and it would no doubt be agreeable to their constituents to be relieved from a large proportion of such at the cost of the population of the rural districts.

MR. MILLER said, that knowing as he did the feeling of Scotland on this subject, he was glad that his hon. Friend (Mr. Craufurd) had brought forward the Motion. He had had experience of the operation of the law, both in the mineral and in the manufacturing districts, and he knew a little of its operation in the county to which his hon. Friend, who had just sat down, had referred. He might say that he had found the greatest possible dissatisfaction, even among people of different habits, with regard to the operation of the law. In the county of Kincardine, he believed it had been the means of increasing the immorality of the county to an extent which he should not like to describe. There was no doubt that the law had broken down the independence of the poorer classes in Scotland; and he was not aware of any single good which had been done by it for the poor of that country, nor was he acquainted with any place which would bear out what had been stated by the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke). The law was giving the greatest possible dissatisfaction not only as to money, but in regard to the effect which it had upon the population. It had increased immorality to a great extent; it had increased drunkenness, and it was possible to trace paupers going from the room where they got their money straight to the gin-shop, where they spent it, without taking 6*d.* home, and the consequence was that their family had to depend upon the charity of their neighbours for subsistence. That charity had now, to a great extent, frozen up. People now did not take the same care of the poor as they used to do. Charity was also frozen up in another direction, and people did not take the same care of the poor members of their families that they did formerly. On the contrary, sons and daughters were not unfrequently found coming forward and stating that they had nothing to do with maintaining their parents; that that was a matter which belonged to the Board, and that they expected the Board to maintain them in time coming. The result was that disputes frequently arose, which went to the Courts of Law, and entailed serious expense in litigation. He sincerely hoped that that Committee would be granted, and that the inquiry would be as full as it could possibly be made, because he felt satisfied that a partial inquiry would not give satisfaction.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the speakers who had preceded him in that debate had not exaggerated the importance of the subject which his hon. Friend (Mr. Craufurd) had brought before the House. He felt it himself very strongly, and in a great many of the observations which the hon. Member and other hon. Members had made, he (the Lord Advocate) had a very considerable amount of concurrence. Unquestionably, he had not been, nor was he now, an admirer of the Act of 1845. He believed it was absolutely necessary to do something at that time to make a better provision for the support of the poor. He had the impression then — and that impression was not altogether removed from his mind — that the Act ought not probably to have been so sweeping and so stringent as it had absolutely turned out. Legal provision for the poor carried with it sometimes more and sometimes less of those consequences which have been described by hon. Members; and the moment, therefore, they had a legal provision for the poor, it went to a certain extent to dry up the sources of charity, and they did what was far worse — they struck a blow at the independence of the people, and the obligation which in Scotland in former days was supposed to be paramount, of providing for the poorer members of a family. But that had been done. They could not retrace their steps. It would be utterly vain to attempt to go back to the state of things which existed previous to 1845. There was no doubt that that year was a year of calamity. There was a state of things in Scotland that was disgraceful to civilization; and the people, especially in the northern parts of the country, were in a state not of comparative, but of actual starvation. Therefore, while he had that impression he could not put his opinion against that of other hon. Members. The Act had been passed, they had a Poor Law for Scotland — he was thankful to say it was not an able-bodied Poor Law, and he trusted it never would be. The question now was, whether there were any means of improving the system that was then introduced. They could not restore the state of matters that existed before the passing of the Act. He was anxious, he admitted, to limit the inquiry which his hon. Friend had proposed, and he was so because he thought he saw some practical result would follow from the inquiry which the hon. Member wished them to embark in. He did feel, and he repeated, that if they were to embrace in a Committee of that House the whole question of the

Scotch Poor Law, though they might collect a valuable mass of information, it was not likely to come to any practical result. The whole of that matter was inquired into in 1844 and 1845. The Act of 1845 was the result, and if they went back and opened up that ground, he did not imagine that their labours would be likely to produce much advantage to the country. But he could see that there were some questions in which legislation was necessary. First of all, there was the question of the area of chargeability, which was a very important topic. It had been applied in England. He gave no opinion as to whether it could be applied in Scotland; but he did see that on the one hand very considerable advantages might accrue, and that on the other hand the difficulties in the way were not insuperable. Then there was the law of settlement. Certainly his professional experience had led him to this conclusion, that in the way in which the funds were administered by parochial Boards no money was more recklessly squandered than in trying legal questions in matters of settlement, resulting in no benefit of any kind, because the rule, established by the expenditure of hundreds of pounds in one case, not unfrequently turned against the parish in another. He had a strong idea that a great deal might be done in that matter. He did not think that the law of settlement was worth the money it had cost. He thought it might fairly be considered whether it might not be abolished altogether, or, at all events, greatly modified. But then his hon. Friend proposed to go back upon the question of means and substance. There was a great deal of equity in that law in its period; but there was also in it a great deal of difficulty and inconvenience, and he believed that the Scotch Members were all of one opinion on the matter. At all events it could not be raised unless the area of chargeability was so extended that the Poor Law was taken up on something like a national footing. The last matter was the Board of Supervision. The hon. Member for the county of Fife (Sir Robert Anstruther) seemed to say that if he (the Lord Advocate) did not assent to a Committee of Inquiry on that subject, either he or the Board must have something to conceal. Now, if he thought the Board had anything to conceal, he would say that an inquiry ought immediately to be granted. And, since the hon. Member had expressed a desire that that matter should be embraced in the inquiry of the Committee, there could not be the slightest reason why it should not be so. His objection was, that it looked as if there was some reason to impugn the conduct of the Board. It was clear, and he did not in the least disguise the fact, that the burden of the poor rate had become a very serious evil in Scotland, though his own belief was that, under the management of Sir John M'Neill and his successor, the Board of Supervision had executed its duty, which its name implied, of supervising the local boards of the country, with singular fidelity. He knew very well that any inquiry would only redound to their honour. He had sat on the Board himself, and he knew its working well. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had contrived to bring in a charge against the Sheriffs who sat on that Board. He must confess, unless his informants were mistaken, that the state of matters was the reverse—at least, he had heard the Sheriffs strongly express themselves with regard to the amount of time and labour which they had been called upon to devote to the discharge of their duties. When he was at that Board he had known them give a very constant and unremitting attention to their duties, and there occasionally arose very large and difficult questions of law which it was their duty to decide. He had to remind the hon. Member for Edinburgh that when, two or three years since, a Bill was passed in relation to the sanitary arrangements of Scotland, the Board of Supervision was created in that Bill the tribunal to decide upon and to put in operation the sanitary provisions of the Act, thus throwing upon the Board a great deal more labour. And he did not recollect that upon that occasion, or in the course of the discussion upon the Bill, any objection was taken to the constitution of the Board. He had thought it right to say those few words in defence, or rather in vindication of and in justice to the Board, which, as had been observed, had no representative in Parliament. He had only in conclusion, to say, that if his hon. Friend thought fit to extend the inquiry to the Board of Supervision, he had no objection to that course being adopted. He would, however, suggest that the Committee should not be nominated to-night. It was not usual to place the names of hon. Members on the Paper before the appointing of a Committee was agreed to, and he should be obliged if the hon. Member allowed him an opportunity of consulting with him before the Committee was nominated.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that as the learned Lord (the Lord Advocate) had kindly consented to grant the Committee in the form in which he asked for it, it was unnecessary for him to detain the House with any reply. But he could assure the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) that there were the names of no fewer than eight county Members on the list he had drawn up for the Committee, and that he had no intention to do anything disrespectful to the hon. Baronet, or any other desire than to form such a Committee as might be deemed competent to undertake that inquiry. His sole object in putting the names down on that day's Paper was to elicit the expression of opinion they had had that evening, and he would at once yield to the wish of the House on that matter. As to his having selected junior Members, the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had already explained what had happened in regard to himself, and as to the hon. Members for Glasgow, their case was much the same as his. With respect to the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) he had taken the first opportunity he had of inviting that right hon. Gentleman's co-operation, and he expected an early answer from him on the subject. He would at present withdraw the names he had suggested for the Committee, his only desire being to constitute such a Committee as would give thorough confidence to the people of Scotland.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the operation of the Poor Law in Scotland; and, whether any and what amendments should be made therein."—(Mr. Craufurd.)

And, on March 17, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. CRAUFURD, the LORD ADVOCATE, SIR ROBERT ANSTYRUTHER, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. ARMISTEAD, Mr. CAMERON, SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE, Mr. ELLIOT, Mr. CHUM-EWING, Mr. ORMEWING, Mr. FORDYCE, Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. LOCH, Mr. MACKINTOSH, Mr. M'LAGAN, Mr. MILLER, SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, Mr. PARKER, SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN, and Mr. ARTHUR PERL:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

LOCAL TAXATION.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, who had given notice that he would call attention to this subject, said, he did not propose at that late hour to trouble the House then with further discussion on the question embraced in his Notice, it had already been so fully discussed on a former night and almost incidentally that evening by the debate on the Scotch Poor Law. He reserved to himself the right, however, of bringing forward the subject again, and he should do so, partly because the promise of the Prime Minister had not been sufficiently definite as to time, and partly because he thought that as the Government had acceded to the appointment of a Committee for Scotland they could hardly refuse a similar inquiry, or immediate legislation as regards England. He should bring the matter forward again shortly after Easter, and meanwhile he wished to impress upon the Government the fact that the feeling was as strong in this country as it was in Scotland, that some alteration in the present working of the Poor Law was urgently required.

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. M'LAGAN, in rising to move that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Game Laws of Scotland said, the measure was almost identical with that which he brought forward in 1867. It would be recollected that it, along with a Bill introduced by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) was referred last year to a Select Committee. And as the Amendments which were made in the Committee and embodied in the Bill, did not give much satisfaction in Scotland, as the question of the Game Laws had made considerable advance in Scotland since last Session, and as the game question was made one of the principal questions at the hustings in that country at the late election, he thought he was warranted in bringing it before the new Parliament. The main provisions of the measure, which he now asked leave to introduce were—first, that hares and rabbits should not be deemed game within the meaning of the ordinary Game Laws: secondly, that cumulative punishments or penalties for offences under the Game Laws should be abolished: thirdly, that prosecutions under the Game Laws should be transferred from the jurisdiction of the Justices of the Peace to that of Sheriffs of counties: and, fourthly, the Bill provided a speedy mode by which tenants might obtain compensation for damage done to crops by game. The principal alteration he had to propose as contained in the Bill was in the fourth clause—namely, that which provided a speedier mode by which tenants could obtain compensation for damage done by game. He might state that with regard to this matter he had availed himself largely of suggestions thrown out by the Lord Advocate in the Select Committee of 1867, and had embodied those suggestions in that clause of his Bill. He now asked leave of the House to introduce a Bill to Amend the Game Laws of Scotland.

MR. FORDYCE said, he had much pleasure in seconding the Motion made by his hon. Friend, whose Bill he accepted as a compromise. He trusted that if the measure was to be opposed by Her Majesty's Government they would take the measure in their own hands, so that they might be able to legislate upon it during the present Session. It seemed to him that, considering the loyalty of the Scotch constituencies to the present occupants of the Treasury Bench, they had some right to make that demand at the hands of the Government.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought the absence of the noble Lord, the Member for Haddingtonshire, (Lord Elcho) would tend to simplify matters, for they would now have only one Bill to consider instead of two. He was, therefore, very much indebted to him for having withdrawn his Bill and thus left the stage clear for the introduction of that of his hon. Friend, the Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan). Like his hon. Friend (Mr. Fordyce) who had just sat down, he looked upon that Bill as a compromise, and he thought it might, perhaps, be a wise one. He trusted that his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate would endeavour, when the Bill was passing through Committee, to amend it by giving some additional power to the tenants of obtaining speedy compensation for the damage done by game. He could say, from his own experience at the last election, that there was no question which attracted more attention in Scotland than the question of the Game Laws, not merely among the proprietors of land and their tenants, but among the people themselves, who felt that there was a great destruction by game of food which would otherwise be available for the use of the people. Therefore, the question was removed from the position it used to occupy, as one chiefly interesting to the sportsman and the tenant. There was, doubtless, considerable injury inflicted by the unnecessary consumption of food which would otherwise be used as food by the people.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he could fully confirm the statements made by the hon. Members who had addressed the House upon that subject, that the question of the Game Laws was one that had attracted very considerable attention in Scotland, and he trusted that leave would be given to bring in the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was no objection to the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire bringing in his Bill. He should reserve any observations he might have to make upon it until it was brought up for a second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Game Laws of Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'LAGAN, Mr. FORDYCE, and Mr. ORR EWING.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 82.]

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolution [Feb. 26] reported.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK rose to call the attention of the House to the Supplemental Vote passed last evening, and now being reported to the House. He alluded particularly to the large sum of £11,738 paid for public buildings, and to ask how it came to pass that so large a sum had to be paid for arbitration claims in connection with Westminster Bridge? He also commented on the increased charge of £17,200 for the constabulary force in Ireland, on the charge for new pensions and retiring allowances connected with Irish Law Courts, and on the addition of £18,000 to the outlay on printing and stationery, contending that some explanation of those items was required, and objecting generally to a Supplementary Estimate.

LORD ELCHO said, he should like to know whether the hon. Gentleman, in whose name Notice of a Question stood on the Paper that evening with case, however, the Act, had been passed, compensation had been granted under it, and all that could be done was to carry out the arrangement. In some particulars the apparent increase of Estimate would be only nominal, for the increase of salary was in substitution for fees which would in future be paid, not to the officer, but into the Consolidated Fund. There was, also, a transfer of charge from other funds to the Vote. The three causes which he had now explained together occasioned a charge of £19,000; and it appeared to Her Majesty's Government that the best and most distinct way of bringing the matter forward was in the shape of a Supplementary Estimate, so that the House might have before it any increase in the expenditure. His hon. Friend viewed Supplementary Estimates with dislike. But if the House were to adopt that view, the only possible course would be to bring forward very outside Estimates in the first instance; and he was sorry to say that when once an Estimate was voted, everybody concerned in spending apparently thought it his duty to get rid of the money to the full extent of the Vote. The better course, therefore, was to frame the original Estimates as closely as possible to the probable requirements; and if afterwards it became necessary to provide for an excess, to bring it forward in a shape that admitted of its being examined and inquired into by hon. Members.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he hoped the warning just given by the Secretary to the Treasury with regard to the mania of moving for Returns would not be thrown away upon a new House. He might speak freely on this matter, for during the seventeen years he had been in the House he had only moved for one Return; it was contained on a single sheet of paper, and he would candidly admit that he believed it was nearly useless. The great body of the Returns published were not only useless but mischievous, for they produced a feeling of despair upon the Members. One very hard-working Member of the House told him that if fewer Returns were published he should read a great many more of them. The only way of checking the multiplication of these Papers would be the adoption of some salutary rule, under which the Member moving for the Return would be obliged to pay a percent-

BURLIALS REGULATION BILL.

Acts read; considered in Committee.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law which regulates the Burial of Persons in England not belonging to the Established Church.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. HADFIELD, Mr. CHARLES REED, Mr. HENRY RICHARD, and Mr. CANDLISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 33.]

House adjourned at half after Nine o'clock.

BAYSWATER MARKET AND BATHS BILL. (by Order.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. CHAMBERS moved that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months. This was a Bill for the establishment of a market and baths between Westbourne Grove and Westbourne Park, in the parish of Paddington, and for this purpose four persons, whose names were mentioned in the Bill, were incorporated, with power to take land compulsorily. The addresses of these persons were unknown, and he had tried in vain to find them. The promoters of the scheme proposed to take certain land belonging to the vestry and the trustees of the poor of the parish of Paddington. They also sought powers to build houses upon the frontage of this land. Five years was the period they asked for the completion of the works, and after the market and baths were constructed they wished to be allowed to hold them for ninety-nine years, or to be permitted to sell or dispose of them to a corporation or other persons. The objections to the Bill were very numerous. First of all, there was not the slightest necessity for a market in the locality, nor did the inhabitants demand any such thing. The affair was, in fact, a mere building speculation. The parish authorities opposed the measure, because they were to be deprived of land which they held for behoof of the poor, merely to accommodate certain private and unknown speculators who desired to turn the scheme to their individual profit. Those who promoted the Bill pointed to Lambeth as an instance of the good that was gained by the establishment in the metropolis of markets like the one proposed. It was quite true that the market at Lambeth served very useful purposes; but the case of Paddington was very different from that of Lambeth. The latter had a very poor population to whom the market was a convenience, but the former was a district filled almost entirely with houses of a first-class character, which were inhabited by rich people, whose convenience was amply provided for by a large number of shops of every description. This proposed market was to be placed in a situation where there was a very great traffic of cabs and omnibuses, and would prove an obstruction. Moreover, it was the intention of the promoters to open up Westbourne Park, and make it a thoroughfare—a step that would seriously diminish the value of the house property in that neighbourhood, as the people who lived there had taken up their residence in that spot on account of its quietness and its retired situation. Apart, however, from these objections, there was one which took precedence of them all; and that was that it was not the practice of Parliament to give compulsory powers to any company merely for the advancement of a purely private speculation. They had an instance of this in what occurred not long ago. A proposal was made by some private speculators to pull down the houses in the narrow part of the Strand, in front of Holywell Street, for the purpose of erecting a large hotel. When the Bill came under the consideration of Lord Redesdale that noble Lord declared that

Parliament would never give such a power to private speculators; and that it would be very unfair to throw upon the parish the immense expense of opposing such a measure before a Select Committee. The Bill was accordingly thrown out upon the Standing Orders, and this was what he (Mr. Chambers) wished the House to do upon the present occasion. The inhabitants of Paddington had instructed him to say that they did not want the proposed market; that it would be a nuisance to the neighbourhood, and would seriously deteriorate the value of property, and that the vestry ought not to be deprived of the land which they held for behoof of the poor, and which was yearly increasing in value. He hoped, therefore, that the House would reject the Bill, and not allow it to go before a Select Committee.

COLONEL SYKES seconded the Motion. He had no hesitation in saying that the proposal of the promoters of this scheme was an outrage upon the people of Paddington. It was a mere jobbing speculation on the part of persons, whose very names were unknown, to rob the poor in order to advance their own interests. He was sure the good sense of the House would never grant such a demand.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr Thomas Chambers.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. PEASE moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He said he did so simply because no other Member had placed any notice of opposition to this project on the Paper. The other evening the House, on constitutional grounds, refused to allow a Bill.

to be introduced by a noble Lord; and there was an equally important constitutional question at stake in connection with this Bill—namely, whether or not the House would grant permission to a private company to monopolize a large portion, and in some cases one-half of the roadway of some of the chief thoroughfares of the metropolis. The House would have to judge whether this could be done without seriously affecting the public interests and greatly damaging the public convenience. There was a Motion on the Paper to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, but he thought the House would come to a much better decision than any Committee. Hitherto the history of tramways in the metropolis had been one of failure and disaster. The first scheme of the kind that ever was proposed was rejected in 1858, and in 1861 upon the proposal being revived, it was thrown out without a division. Again in 1866-7 a Tramway Bill was rejected upon the Standing Orders, and in the following Session it met with a similar fate at the hands of the House itself without a division. Trial of the tramway system had been made in the Westminster Bridge Road and Victoria Street, and in Bayswater Road, but without success, and ultimately the rails were pulled up and the schemes altogether abandoned, all parties agreeing that it was altogether unsuited to the thoroughfares of the metropolis. Had the parties who promoted this Bill confined their proposal to Kennington Road he should probably not have objected, but they proposed to lay down tramways in Westminster Bridge Road, where the traffic was very great, and where great public inconvenience would be the result. They were told that the system worked well in New York, but it was to be remembered that neither in Fifth Avenue nor in Broadway of that city, which were chief thoroughfares, were there any tramways. Moreover, the people of New York were in a measure compelled to use tramways on account of the state of the pavement which, according to Mr. Sala, was so execrable that hansom cabs could not traverse the streets. Copenhagen was also cited as an instance of the good working of the tramway system, but it would be well to bear in mind that more carriages passed up and down Westminster Road in the course of a day than were to be found in all

Copenhagen. Were the rails laid alongside the road they would seriously interfere with the business of the tradesmen and merchants along the route, for it would prevent carriages from standing before their shop doors; and would prevent carts from being loaded and unloaded with their goods. If, on the other hand, the rails were laid in the middle of the road the progress of vehicles would be seriously interrupted, and drivers would have continually to cross and re-cross the rails. The narrow part of the Westminster Bridge Road was only 37 feet 6 inches wide, and if the tramway were laid in the centre only 14 feet would be left on each side for other vehicles. In Palace Road the width was only 29 feet. In Stangate the width was only 13 feet 10 inches. He was told that the rails to be used by this company were very superior to those which were laid down by George Francis Train. There certainly was some difference between them, but it was not such as to warrant any argument being based upon them in favour of the Bill. No one could deny that after the rail had been down a short time the rail on the blocks of granite would be three or four inches above the road, and would be dangerous to any carriage that was driven over the rails. He begged to remind the House that the Metropolitan Police Bill which had recently been passed placed in the hands of the Commissioner of Police great powers for the purpose of regulating the traffic, and these powers would, to a large extent, be rendered nugatory if they now placed half their streets in the hands of a private company. But it was urged that these tramways would be a great benefit to the working classes. On that plea he had supported the experiment made of a tramway along the Old North Road, one of the widest highways of Dartington, but after a short time everybody came to the conclusion that it was only a great nuisance, and it was taken up. But let them look a little into the benefits which were to be conferred on working men by this scheme. There would be two carriages morning and evening, at the rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a mile, which would, allowing sixty to the carriage, accommodate 120 workmen. For the rest of the working men and the public there was a minimum charge of 3d. a mile, so that the plea was simply absurd, and would not for a moment compare with facilities afforded by the railway companies—the Metropolitan having agreed to run workmen's trains morning and evening, charging 1*d.* for the whole distance from Kensington to Trinity Square, Tower Hill. For these reasons, he hoped the House would reject the measure, and not throw upon the objectors the expense of fighting the Bill before a Select Committee.

MR. LOCKE seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Pease.)

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR said, although he rose for the purpose of asking the House to take an entirely different view of the case from that which had been taken by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, he (Captain Grosvenor) could not affect to feel surprised at the prejudice which existed against the tramway system when he considered that it was associated in the public mind with the recollection of that obnoxious agitator, Mr. George Francis Train. That gentleman obtained leave to lay down various tramways, and not satisfied with constituting himself a public nuisance by his manner, tone, and general method of procedure he laid down his rails upon a principle so faulty as to threaten the destruction of any carriage with ordinary wheels that ventured upon their track. He would remind the House, however, that it was not Mr. Train who was now applying for power to lay down tramways, nor did the promoters intend to revive the imperfect invention of that gentleman. They proposed to pursue a course in every way the opposite of his. First, by every means to conciliate the public; and, secondly, to lay down rails in such a manner that they could not by any possibility obstruct the ordinary traffic. The interests of the company itself, as well as the strict provision in the Bill, guaranteed that this would be done—because if the rails were not laid down in a manner which commended itself to the public, they would have to be taken up again at great expense. As regarded the practicability of the project, it had long since been established by actual experience. Darlington had been referred to by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down as an instance of the failure of the system, but for his part he would adduce the case of Birkenhead, where it had been amply tried, and was a great success. An attempt had been made by some interested persons in Birkenhead to do away with the tramways on the ground that they were an inconvenience, but the jury before whom the case was tried declared that they were not a nuisance but an advantage; and the verdict was confirmed by acclamation in the town. That was in 1865, and from that time up to the present Birkenhead had enjoyed the use of the tramways. The prejudice, therefore, which existed against the name of Mr. Train should not be allowed to stand in the way of effecting a great public improvement. Who were the objectors to the proposal? The proprietors of the public vehicles that at present plied in the thoroughfares of the metropolis. From what these gentlemen said, one would suppose that London was supplied with better and cheaper means of locomotion than any other city in the world, instead of something like the reverse being the case. These omnibus proprietors who now opposed tramways, had not been always of opinion that they were mischievous. On the contrary, he found from the Report of the General Omnibus Company of 1857 that their chief engineer was in favour of the tramway system; and, in The Times of November 20 in that year he had seen it stated that the company were about to expend £50,000 of their surplus capital in laying down tramways for their own use. The fact that the directors had not carried out their intention he regarded as a loss both to themselves and the public. His object in mentioning this was to show that the omnibus company who now objected to tramways had really approved of their principle. It seemed to him that the practical objections to this Bill were very difficult to find, and though he had listened with attention to the statement of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease) he had not been much assisted in getting at these objections. One statement made by the hon. Gentleman was to the effect that the streets of London were too narrow for the successful application of the tramway system. An answer to that was to be found in the practice of foreign cities where tramways were common, although the streets were narrow and also crowded. Apart from this, however, the Bill did not contemplate the introduction of tramways into any thoroughfare that could properly be called both crowded and narrow. The vestry of St. George's, Hanover Square, had petitioned against an analogous measure on the ground that they objected to giving up a portion of the public way to a company of speculators. This was not a question, however, of giving up a portion of the thoroughfares; for after the tramway was laid down the public would have precisely the same rights over the roadway as at present. The only right the vestry would give up was that of paying for the maintenance of that portion of the road used by the company. It was urged that the promoters were speculators, and that they ought not to be encouraged; but he did not think the House would be inclined unduly to curtail the spirit of legitimate enterprise. It was gratifying to find that, with one exception, the vestries concerned on the other side of the water, appreciating the advantages which would thus be conferred upon the ratepayers, gave their cordial support to the promoters of the Bill. He felt confident that, taking into consideration the peculiar circumstances of the case, the inducements held out to the promoters by special Standing Orders to proceed with their Bill, and the money which had been spent in bringing matters to this stage, the House would at all events afford the promoters the opportunity of obtaining a fair and candid consideration of their scheme. This was all that the promoters asked, and all that they required in order to prove that the realization of their scheme would confer a substantial and unqualified benefit upon all classes of the community.

MR. LOCKE said, he was not surprised at the support which the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Captain Grosvenor) gave the Bill when he considered that the scheme did not propose to carry the tramways into Westminster. But on behalf of the people of Southwark, who were directly interested, he (Mr. Locke) was there to oppose the measure. Unfortunately with regard to private Bills, nobody seemed to know anything about them. It was very difficult to ascertain, for instance, who were for and who against such Bills. In the present case they were told that a number of philanthropists had banded themselves together for the purpose of benefiting the public at large. He, for his part, however, must acknowledge that he had never seen one of those so-called benefactors in his life. He believed that, in this instance, a good many of them came from across the Atlantic, and they came according to their own account in order to benefit the British public; but he hoped the British public would be able to estimate these proposals at their true worth. These philanthropists maintained that the tramways would be flush with the road, but how could any tramway having a groove in it for a flange to run in be flush with the road? The difficulty with regard to Mr. Train's tramways was, that no carriage could pass over them without danger, and sometimes accidents were the result. The Court of Queen's Bench having declared them a nuisance they had to be taken up. He had taken the trouble to go to Kennington to look at the plans and the model of the rails of the proposed tramway, in order to see whether they fulfilled the description given of them in the Notice Papers of the House. He had found that the tramway was not flush with the roadway, and that the same kind of inconvenience would occur as occurred in reference to Mr. Train's tramway, though perhaps it would not be to the same extent. These philanthropists would monopolize the road. ["No, no!"] What he called monopolizing a road was this—that the tramway upon which the carriages were to run would be so laid down that the vehicles passing along them could by no possibility turn out of the way, for there were flanges to the wheels. If this was not "monopolizing" part of the road, he did not know what he was to understand by monopoly. He would call to the minds of hon. Members the state of Westminster Bridge when it was first thrown open to the public, and when no vehicle could cross from side to side of the road, the centre being appropriated to heavy traffic. Everybody objected to that state of things, but no one moved in the matter except himself, and he asked a Question—indeed he believed that he kept on asking it about once a fortnight throughout the Session. He spoke to his right hon. Friend, the then First Commissioner of Works (Mr. W. Cowper) upon the matter, and what he heard from him was, that Mr. Page was enamoured of the plan, that he (the First Commissioner) did not approve of it, and that it would in time go. Now it had gone, and they had an opportunity of seeing what Westminster Bridge was with the tramway gone. He asked the House to consider where it was proposed that these tramways should go in Southwark. They were to start from Westminster Bridge, and go along York Road, which was not a very wide road; they were to cross Waterloo Road, and were then to go the whole length of Stamford Street, then to cross Blackfriars Road into Southwark Street, and thence along Southwark Bridge Road to the bridge. He could not conceive a greater inconvenience than that of a company monopolizing these roads, which formed a principal line of communication between Westminster and the City. If the Bill were passed hon. Members, on taking this new and quick route, would have those tremendous vehicles of the company rushing along their road and subjecting them to all kinds of danger; and it was not shown that any particular class of people would be benefited by it. It was indeed said that it would be a great thing for the working classes; but this was said by the philanthropists; and no doubt it would be a great good to these last-named people. There had lately been great difficulty in floating anything; there was no buoyancy in the British public; but when any concern could be got to float no doubt it was a good thing for those who got it off. It was said that if the thing did not pay the company would give it up; but who was to make them give it up? and they all knew possession was nine points of the law. He should like to know who would be the man to "bell the cat" and turn the company out of our narrow streets. His plan was not to let them in. The philanthropists said that they must adopt this scheme because so many places had adopted it. It was said that it had been adopted in America. Now he (Mr. Locke) had never been there, but the other day he heard a gentleman speak who was very fond of America, and doated upon American institutions, and he said that the greatest nuisance was these tramways in Philadelphia. Paris also appeared in the programme of the philanthropists, and it was stated in their document that they had got a tramway from Paris to Boulogne. [An hon. MEMBER: Bois de Boulogne.] No, it was "Boulogne." Every hon. Member knew that there was a little village a short distance out of Paris called Boulogne; and the company had used the name of this place, and left the ignorant to imagine that the tramway went all the way to the town of Boulogne, and greatly facilitated the communication between Paris and England. Now, where were the tramways laid down in Paris? They started close to the Place de Carrousel, which was a large open space, and they ran along by the river on an immensely wide road; and in this way they got to St. Cloud, and, he believed, also to Versailles. The case might have been somewhat parallel to London if there had been tramways along the Boulevards—which, by-the-by, were perhaps twice as wide as any street in London; but though Baron Haussmann was a bold man, yet he had never attempted this, and he (Mr. Locke) firmly believed that were he to attempt to lay down a tramway along the Boulevard, even with the Emperor to back him, the public would not submit to it. There was no tramway in Paris along any street in which there was a large traffic, though there was no better managed city; nor any where there were more omnibuses, nor where it was more necessary that the working classes should be accommodated. In his opinion there was no necessity for this Bill going to a Committee, because hon. Members could well judge of the question from their own knowledge of the state of the public roads. In his opinion the steamboat and omnibus accommodation were amply sufficient to supply all the public wants along the line which he had pointed out, through which it was the intention of the Company to lay down these trams in the borough of Southwark, and he hoped that the House would vote that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to give his testimony as an independent witness to the value of tramways. Although up to a recent period he had been much prejudiced against them, his recent experience of their working in New York and New Orleans had led him to the conclusion that they were of the greatest public utility. The hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease) had quoted Mr. Sala as a conclusive authority on the subject; but although one who appreciated light literature and admired Mr. Sala's ability, he contended that Mr. Sala's fault was that of a sensational writer who could do nothing unless he laid on the colours thick. Mr. Sala was a most amusing companion at the breakfast table; but he was about the last writer in England upon whose testimony he would rely, or to whom any Member, having respect for his position as a legislator, should go for facts on a matter of grave importance. Mr. Sala's description of New York was extravagant and nothing but a caricature, the result of Mr. Sala's playfulness of style. He said this from what he had seen during five weeks' residence in the City of New York. The tramways would be of the greatest use to all classes, and the argument that the two workmen's cars would carry only 120 persons during the day was fallacious, because the passengers would not ride the whole length of the line, and would most probably be replaced four times in a journey. The fact was that the tramways in New York and elsewhere were of the greatest value to the working classes. He admitted that some of the American tramways were faulty, but the majority of those he passed over in carriages did not obstruct the passage of the wheels in the least. He knew that in New Orleans the tramways were an immense property, and he believed that there was hardly a town in America of 40,000 inhabitants in which there was not a street tramway. He asked, would there be any harm in sending the matter to a Select Committee, so that they might not legislate upon any absurd prejudice or false statement? The reason why tramways were not generally adopted in Paris was that the system of "correspondence" was perfect, and one of the cheapest in the world. He, like the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke), did not believe in philanthropists, but he did believe in speculators, and it would not be worthy of the House to be carried away by an idle sneer against a class of men who had done so much for England. Our railways and many other most important social undertakings were entirely the result of private speculation.

MR. LAIRD said, he could give his most emphatic testimony to the value of street tramways. Some years ago one was laid down in Birkenhead, and the mode of working was at first greatly complained of. The rails were thereupon removed and replaced by others, and from that time there had been no complaint. Now, nothing would occasion a greater annoyance to the inhabitants of Birkenhead than that the street railways should be removed. They ran from the Ferry to the very heart of the town, and were a convenience to thousands of working men. He himself was constantly riding through the streets of the town, but he never found that there was any danger or inconvenience arising from the tramway. There was another street railway in Liverpool, which ran by the six miles of docks, and it was a great accommodation, and he had never heard of any inconvenience arising from it.

MR. SHAW - LEFEVRE said, he wished to express the opinion of the Board of Trade that this Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee, and to state that the Metropolitan Board of Works entertained the same opinion. The question then before them was not whether the scheme proposed was all that could be wished, but whether, considering the testimony borne to the value of tramways by the last two speakers, the subject did not deserve inquiry. He could support the view taken by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) from his own experience of tramways in America; he had never experienced any shock when passing over the line in a private carriage. He fully concurred as to the advantages derived from tramways in America. There was scarcely a town in that country which was without a tramway, and he saw no reason why a good system of trams should not be tried in the less crowded thoroughfares of the metropolis. There were no less than three Bills now before the House which proposed that forty-one miles of tramways should be laid down in the suburbs, and he understood that it was the intention of the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes) to move to refer all these Bills to the same Committee, and that the Standing Orders should be suspended, so as to permit anybody whatever to oppose the Bills without being objected to on the ground of locus standi. On the part of the Government he should support that Motion, he hoped therefore that the Bill would be read a second time.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, his experience of the American tramways had been quite the opposite of that of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire). Tramways were possible in the United States only because the streets were very broad, ran at right angles, and were but little encumbered by traffic. If tramways were so advantageous as had been stated, why did not the most enterprising people in the world lay them down in Broadway? In Montreal, the only tramway that paid was one that ran from one end of the town to the other, and it paid because in some parts the roads were so narrow that people were obliged to use the tramway to make their journey. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Captain Grosvenor) had said that if the tram were found to be a public inconvenience it would not pay, and then the company would have to remove it; but if the company monopolized the road, as the Montreal tram did, the line would be sure to pay, because the public would be obliged to use it. It was said that if tramways were adopted, the inhabitants would have to keep only half the width of the roads in repair; but then the half would have the traffic upon it doubled, because the traffic would be diverted from the tramway to the common road; so that the cost of machinery of the road borne by the parish would be much the same as it was now. Another objection was the stopping of the ordinary traffic by the police to allow the passengers to get from the trams to the pathway. The danger of the trams was notorious. He had recently heard of a gentleman's carriage being smashed to pieces through being unable to get off the line in time; and when in New York, he had heard of forty accidents occurring in one day. He had himself driven before a car on a tram, and it reminded him of nothing as much as flying before an express train at full speed.

MR. BAKER said, he strongly objected to the measure, and must oppose the second reading. The proposed trams ran into Essex, although the title referred only to the metropolis. As the measure stood trams might be extended even into Sussex. There was a part of the road between Whitechapel and Stratford so narrow that it was called "the funnel," and let the police do their best to regulate the traffic, it would be impossible, if this tramway were established, but that accidents would be greatly increased.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he thought it was very inconvenient to decide questions of this sort in the House. As the testimony with regard to the working of tramways in New York and elsewhere were most conflicting, the proper course would be to send the Bill to a Committee. They could not have before them in the House the plans and sections necessary to determine the matter, and surely it was not because ten years ago an objectionable plan was brought forward, that they should now decide against any plan whatever. At present the working classes in London travelled great distances on foot, and anyone who devised a plan by which they could be relieved of this necessity must be regarded as a public benefactor.

MR. M'ARTHUR said, that most of the arguments against proceeding further with the measure, reminded him of those which were formerly used against railways. He had travelled in street tramways in the crowded thoroughfares of New York, and he had no hesitation in saying that if the system were once fairly introduced into the metropolis, such advantage would result, that everybody would be opposed to its withdrawal. He hoped the measure would be allowed to go to a Select Committee.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) in his description of the tramway in Paris, had omitted a most important point, which was that it ran at right angles to the four or five bridges over which the entire traffic of the city passed. When he met the hon. Gentleman in Paris at the time of the Exhibition those bridges were crowded with carriages, which crossed the tramway diagonally without slackening their speed; and he wanted to know whether his hon. Friend had ever heard of an accident having occurred there. He thought it hard that any well-considered plan should inherit the prejudice which had been created by the scheme of Mr. Train.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, admitting that the question of rails or of carriages or of the public advantage of tramways was a proper one for a Committee, he entertained a strong preliminary objection to the measure—he objected to giving up a portion of the public streets to any private company. If the scheme were a good one the road ought to be under the control of the public authorities; the most that should be done was to let it to a company. He hoped the Board of Trade would protect the interests of the public in that respect, and not allow a portion of the Queen's highway to be alienated, as it would be, for ever by this Bill.

MR. WALTER said, if his vote on this question depended solely upon his experience of Mr. Train's railway he would have given this proposal his unqualified opposition. But, having witnessed the operation of the tramway system in almost every important town in North America, and knowing what was to be said on both sides of the question, he felt unable to refuse his assent to sending the Bill to a Committee. He thought it would be of great importance to what sort of a Committee the Bill should be referred, as this was a question which could only be decided properly by experience, and the British public were very little conversant with the working of the tramway system. Our crowded thoroughfares in the City of London, and the more densely peopled portions of the metropolis were totally unsuited to it; but there were, nevertheless, parts of the metropolitan area—for instance, the Stockwell Road, the Whitechapel Road, and many others of the less crowded thoroughfares in which a system of tramways would be an unmixed benefit. It would, he thought, be the duty of any Committee to take a much broader view than was opened by this Bill, and to see whether a much larger scheme might not be adopted in the outskirts of London without interfering with the crowded thoroughfares. As to what had been said of New York, you would not find a single gentleman there who would not bear testimony to the great advantage to the whole community of the tramway system, and yet there had been a constant fight going on between the authorities of the town and the tramway companies about getting a tramway into Broadway. He remembered one Sunday morning finding the road in Broadway pulled up and a number of men laying down tramway rails as fast as they could. The reason they did it on Sunday was because the courts of law could not grant an injunction to restrain them on that day. That was what some would think rather taking a Yankee advantage. But, when he returned to New York, he found the street restored to its normal condition and the tramway taken away. We might take a lesson from the Americans with respect to this matter. They were a practical people, and they would no more allow a tramway to be put down in one of their crowded thoroughfares than they would dispense with them where they could be usefully applied.

MR. BREWER said, that the reason why the authorities of St. George's, Hanover Square, gave only a very qualified opposition to the proposal was because they considered that the traffic of London was one of the difficulties of the age. They doubted, however, whether it would be expedient to transfer the care of the roads from a public body to a private one. The substitution of a groove for a flange was considered a great improvement.

The House divided:—Ayes 209; Noes 78: Majority 131.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

Ordered, That the Metropolitan Street Tramways Bill and all other Metropolitan Street Tramways Bills be referred to the same Committee; and that all Petitioners who may pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel or Agents, against any of the said Bills, be heard, without reference to any question of locus standi, upon the allegations contained in their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bills against such Petitions.—(Mr. Thomas Hughes.)

PARLIAMENT—THE EASTER RECESS. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. AYRTON said, it might be convenient to hon. Members if, in the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, he were to inform the House that, if the state of Public Business would admit, it was the intention of his right hon. Friend to move that the House, at its rising on Tuesday, the 23rd inst., be adjourned until the 1st of April.

ASSESSED RATES BILL.—QUESTION.

In reply to Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, MR. AYRTON said, it was proposed to put this Bill down for Monday instead of Thursday, but, if it should be found that it would be inconvenient to hon.

Members to discuss it on that day, the Government would be prepared to consider any application on the subject. It was very desirable, however, that the House should proceed with the second reading as soon as possible.

SUNDAY TRADING BILL—[BILL 5.]

(Mr. Thomas Hughes, Lord Claud Hamilton.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, he desired shortly to remind the House of the position of the question to which it related. Legislation on that question had been recommended by two Select Committees of the House of Commons, and one Select Committee of the House of Lords; and the present Bill, or one exactly similar, except on certain minor points, was introduced by himself, and read the second time without a division in that House in 1867, and again in 1868; its second reading was carried on a division by a majority of more than 2 to 1. Two successive Secretaries of State under the last Government approved of considering the Bill in Committee, and of legislation on the subject; and he was authorized to say that the present Government also thought it desirable to allow it to go into Committee that it might be modified in the second clause, on which the Bill chiefly turned, and that some measure of that kind ought to be passed. At present the law in reference to Sunday trading rested upon the statute of the 29th of Charles II., and the lapse of more than 200 years since that Act was passed had greatly changed the state of things to which such legislation was applicable. Indeed, the position which that Act occupied on the Statute-book was of itself sufficient to show that it was not likely to be suited to modern circumstances, and required amendment, for it stood between the Statute of Frauds and the Act repealing the Writ de Hæretico Comburendo. The statute of Charles II. prohibited the dealing on Sundays in any article whatever, with the exception of milk, up to nine o'clock a.m., and of cooked provisions in places properly licensed for their sale. The method provided by that Act for carrying out its principle was one that had been found totally unworkable—namely, a fine of 5s., levied in the first instance on the goods offered for sale. The process was that the goods should be seized and sold by the authorities, the fines deducted from the proceeds of the sale, and the surplus handed over to the persons who had broken the law. Some time ago, in order to enforce the law, about 800 summonses were taken out in South London against persons charged with that offence, 700 of those persons promised to abstain from Sunday trading, saying that they should be thankful if all shops could be closed; but the 100 remaining on the list completely defied the law. The magistrates found they had not the power to make the law work, and the consequence, in regard to Sunday trading in the metropolis was that matters were getting worse and worse, and the law was now deliberately broken week after week in every street and square. He should mention, perhaps, that since the statute of Charles II., a small Act had been passed in the reign of Queen Anne enabling mackerel to be sold at certain hours on Sunday, as also another Act regulating the baking trade. In the year 1858 the then Archdeacon of Middlesex (Archdeacon Sinclair) went carefully into this subject, and compiled statistics showing that in certain districts of the metropolis, then comprising a population of about 500,000, out of nearly 13,000 shops 6,825, or more than half the entire number, were kept open after ten o'clock on Sunday morning. Since then matters had grown worse, tradesmen who formerly, in his own experience, did little or no business on Sundays now systematically violated the law, unwillingly in most cases, but driven on by the intense competition to which they were subject; and that was going on in all parts of London. Last Sunday he (Mr. Hughes) walked through a small district of the metropolis, and at the end of one street he found the three shops adjoining each other open to the public, and their proprietors canvassing for business. Those shops were a butcher's, a shoe shop, and a tinman's. He remembered, a few years ago, when the butcher did business in a quiet deprecatory way, and his neighbours were closed; now he was roaring "Who'll buy" in the middle of the street; the shoeman was polishing shoes in his apron, showing however his respect for the day by wearing his best hat and coat; and the tinman's door was open with goods deposited for sale round it. He firmly believed that what

Lord Russell said in 1866 was perfectly true—namely, that unless Parliament interposed to do something in this matter they ran great risk of losing Sunday altogether as a civil institution, for he would not here treat of that day in its religious aspect. Much had been spoken and written about the want of reverence for the law in England of late years, and no doubt there were many signs which showed the fact to be so ; but how were they to expect the people in general to retain their respect for law when it was allowed to be openly broken week after week, in every part of the metropolis, without the Government or the local authorities being able to stop its breach ? A correspondent of The Times last autumn gave a description of the great bird fair near Bethnal Green. That description was not exaggerated, and it showed that in a large district, including two churches, a regular fair was held, in which not only fancy dogs and birds, but marine stores, haberdashery, and other goods, were sold not merely at an early hour but during the hours of Divine service. Parliament, he maintained, was bound to make the law in that matter such as they believed would be for the good of the public, and also to give the local authorities the means of carrying it out. What, then, were the alternatives open to them ? Firstly, they might sweep away all legislation on that subject, and leave Sunday trading entirely to the good sense of the community. He did not, however, believe the House would agree to that. Secondly, they might strengthen the Act of Charles II. by imposing penalties that could really be worked so as to make that Act one which could be effectually enforced in the metropolis and in other large towns. He would be sorry to see anything of that kind done. He came, therefore, to the third alternative. He thought it was better not to strengthen the Act of Charles II., and leave it simply as the governing statute on that subject. Still, as many persons felt great attachment to that statute, they might enact that, excepting so far as the Act of Charles II. was inconsistent with or was altered by the provisions of that Bill, it should continue unrepealed. Then came the question, what were the proper modifications of that Act which ought now to be sanctioned ? The second clause of the present Bill stated what those proposed modifications were. No doubt there would be large differences of opinion as to what trading ought and what ought not to be permitted on Sunday morning, but that was a question on which only a Committee of that House could properly decide. He would simply now say that the principle on which the Bill went was this—That all provisions of a perishable kind might be sold up to nine o'clock on Sunday morning ; that cooked provisions and some other articles should be allowed to be sold up to ten o'clock ; and that certain of those articles, such as milk and cooked provisions, should also be allowed to be sold after one o'clock ; but that between ten and one there should be no sale whatever of any articles. It was said that this legislation would specially affect what were called “the dangerous classes” —that there would be some disturbance in the metropolis if such a measure as that were passed. He did not believe that to be so in the least, and he had given the question a good deal of careful attention ; but even if it were the fact, he had yet to learn that Parliament was bound to legislate only for the safe classes. It was, he held, absolutely necessary to legislate on that question, and it was their duty to pass such laws in relation to it, as to other matters, as they conscientiously believed would be most beneficial to the whole community, whatever particular class they might please or displease. And if the present authorities or the present police were not sufficient to carry out the law so passed, let them be doubled, or, if that were still found insufficient, let them be doubled again. The old system of letting all these things take their course, hoping that they would come out right of themselves, had been tried many years, and certainly in that metropolis it had proved a great failure. What the people wanted in London, as elsewhere, was not less government but more. They wanted in many departments a stronger hand than they now had ; and as Parliament now for the first time represented every class, and, therefore, had the whole country at its back, surely it ought to be able to legislate in the direction he had indicated. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Thomas Hughes.)

Mr. Thomas Hughes

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he had not intended to address the House upon this Bill, but as no other Member appeared disposed to oppose the Bill at this stage, he would move its rejection. The question involved considerations connected both with political economy and with the liquor traffic, which ought to be kept distinct from mere Sabbatarian views; and he thought the better course would be to refrain from all partial legislation of that kind, which would only tend to make of their existing legislation on that subject "confusion worse confounded." If the hon. Gentleman would draw up a Bill distinctly embodying his own views, instead of vainly attempting to reconcile the divergent opinions of incongruous parties, who would not be satisfied with that measure when it had passed, the House would then be enabled to deal with it. As the Bill now stood he strongly objected to it, and begged to move that it be read the second time that day six months.

MR. BRADY seconded the Amendment. He was sure from personal knowledge and observation that such a measure would be distasteful to the great majority of the people of London. It was a mistake to suppose that the Sabbath was less observed in the metropolis now than it was twenty or thirty years ago. The fact was that there was a much more satisfactory observance than was formerly the case. The hon. Member for Frome (Mr. Hughes) on a former occasion brought forward this measure to please a certain section of his Lambeth constituency, but he was at a loss to know why he had again brought forward the subject with no further additional arguments in its favour than the hon. Member's reference to three houses—the butcher's, the tinker's, and the shoemaker's. The measure would operate harshly on the poorer classes, many of whom received their wages too late on Saturday to make their purchases on that day, and, moreover, had no pantries in which to keep their provisions in proper condition even for a single night during hot weather. Moreover it was necessary that Sunday trading should be allowed, in order that small tradesmen, who often had to borrow money late on Saturday night of the publican, should be able to procure the necessaries of life.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Taylor.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. MACFIE said, he would give his support to the Bill. He considered that they ought to legislate in such a way as would enable respectable tradesmen who had been accustomed to close their shops on Sundays in a Christian country to continue to do so. Again, the young persons employed all the week in shops ought to have an opportunity afforded them of going either to places of worship or to their homes on Sunday as they thought best. He, for one, disclaimed the name of Sabbatarian. The State enacted a day of rest as a civil institution, and to that he hoped it would steadfastly adhere. The State ought to enforce nothing but rest; it ought not to call upon those who rested to go to church. That was a matter of conscience. But he trusted the State would always secure to those who wished to go to a place of worship on Sunday the requisite time for doing so.

MR. AYRTON said, that as his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department was unfortunately unable to be present, he desired to state on his behalf that the Government did not wish to offer any objection to the second reading of the Bill. As it was usual to allow Bills of that kind to be read the second time in order that their details might receive careful consideration in Committee, he trusted the practice would not be departed from in that instance. By reading that measure the second time they would, after all, only bear testimony to what he believed to be the feeling of a great majority of the people of this country, that one day out of seven ought to be set apart for religious devotion if people desired it, or, at all events, for abstinence from ordinary work. How far that principle should be sustained by penal legislation was another question, and one that would call for careful examination in Committee. Therefore, in assenting to the second reading, his right hon. Friend did not pledge himself to any of the details of the measure. In Committee the difficulties which surrounded the subject would be clearly seen; and if his hon. Friend (Mr. Hughes) succeeded in surmounting them, and in framing provisions which met with general satisfaction, he would render good service to the public. He concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady) that the inhabitants of the metropolis were not degenerating in regard to the observance of Sunday. On the contrary, for many years past there had been a great improvement in that respect, and an increasing appreciation on the part of the working population of the desirableness of one day in the week being set apart by law for rest from labour. The Act of Charles II., as observed by his hon. Friend, was a very imperfect measure; it was no doubt passed in a time of considerable excitement, and it did not now fulfil the purposes for which it was designed. It could not be affirmed, therefore, that the law was in a proper state; although how it was to be amended was a matter of considerable difficulty. That, however, was a question for the Committee; and he, therefore, hoped that the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) would not press his Amendment to the second reading.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

ELECTION EXPENSES BILL—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Baines, Mr. M'Laren.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, said, he believed an appeal would be made to him from the Treasury Bench to refer the measure to the consideration of the Select Committee which would be appointed to-morrow to inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections. If, however, such a proposal were made, he should do all in his power to resist it, as he strongly deprecated the practice of referring to Committees questions which the House itself was perfectly competent to decide. Such a practice led to a great deal of unnecessary expense, and his experience had shown him that Committees were granted with much too great readiness and frequency. After the ample discussion that had already taken place on the subject no one could deny that the House was in a position to at once come to a decision upon this question without inquiry before a Select Committee. Besides, the questions which would be referred to the Committee about to be appointed were quite of a different nature from that to which his Bill related. The Bill dealt solely with the necessary expenses of candidates, whereas the Committee would inquire into the subject of expenses which were entirely voluntary. He felt, therefore, that he should be promoting the interests of the subject with which the Committee would have to deal if he declared that, as far as he was concerned, he would, if possible, press forward the present measure through all its stages. It had been asked why the necessary expenses of candidates should not be thrown upon the Consolidated Fund instead of charging it upon the rates? In reply to that objection he would remark that some people imagined that the Consolidated Fund was a great source of wealth constantly supplied by the bounty of nature, and from which riches flowed as from a perennial fountain. In point of fact, however, the Consolidated Fund simply represented so much money gathered from the taxpayers, and he objected to this charge being placed upon it, because in such an event, the necessary expenses of elections instead of being diminished would be enormously increased. If they made the constituencies pay the necessary expenses of elections they would interest them in economy, whereas if they threw it on the Consolidated Fund they would interest them in extravagance; and in fact he would much rather things should continue as they were than throw the charge on the Consolidated Fund. But perhaps some hon. Gentlemen might say, "We are in favour of the principle of your proposal, but object to the present mode of raising local taxes"—["Hear, hear!"]—Well, they could not object to the present plan of levying taxes more than he did, and if the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) had carried his Motion to a division the other night the hon. Baronet would not have found a more cordial supporter of it than himself. Hon. Members opposite might feel assured, therefore, that his sympathies on this subject were entirely with them. He asked the House to pass this measure because he felt convinced it was based upon a just principle. It was most important that constituencies should be made to feel that the position of a representative of the people was not one which ought to be bought at an enormous price, but that a man who did his duty to his constituents rendered to them and to the country an important public service, and that it was wrong to call upon him to pay for the opportunity of discharging such a service. This was the main principle on which he rested his argument in favour of the Bill. Some hon. Members, however, would probably assert that they could not support the measure because the constituencies would not like it; but such an assumption on their part would be ill-founded, for whenever the proposal had been explained at a public meeting the poorest of the ratepayers had expressed themselves in favour of it, as they clearly comprehended that unless some measure of the kind were passed there would be no chance of the interests of labour being properly represented in the House of Commons, while they regarded the argument about adding a burden to the rates as paltry and contemptible. On the point of expense, he had made a calculation with reference to a certain borough where there had been a contest at every election during the last fifteen years. Now, taking into account the population of that borough, the amount of its rateable property, and the necessary expenses of all the elections which had occurred, he found that, had the present Bill been in operation, the whole charge thrown upon a ratepayer in a £10-house would have been the price of half an ounce of tobacco once in three years. The people generally were in favour of the Bill, because they felt convinced that under the present system the largest class in this country could not be properly represented. After the Irish Church had been disposed of there could be no doubt that the question of national education, which was peculiarly a working class question, would become the principal subject of discussion in that House, and was it not highly desirable that there should be working men's representatives to inform the House of the views entertained by their constituents? It might perhaps be objected that his Bill dealt only with a very small branch of a very important subject. That was no doubt true, but nevertheless it dealt with a distinct branch, as there was obviously a broad line of demarcation between expenses which were necessary and those which were voluntary. A most important principle was involved in the Bill, which he believed would be fruitful in its consequences, and of great advantage to the country. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

MR. BAINES said, that representing a large constituency, numbering 35,000 electors, he could corroborate the statement of his hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett) that the poorer classes had, whenever they had been appealed to on the subject, expressed themselves in favour of the Bill. In his opinion, indeed, a more popular measure could hardly be proposed. It was not right that there should be a monopoly of the plutocracy in that House. His own experience enabled him to show that the official expenses of conducting elections might be reduced, if the local authorities had a motive for doing it, as by this Bill they would have. In Leeds, at the last election, a number of gentlemen voluntarily offered to discharge gratuitously the duties of deputy returning officers and poll clerks, the result being that the expenses of the candidates were greatly diminished, and he had no doubt voluntary agency would become general if the expenses of the returning officer were thrown on the rates. This would correct some of the abuses which had grown up under paid agency. He was persuaded that a greater mistake could not be committed than to imagine that, if the expenses of elections were diminished, any great number of working men would be brought into that House. The difficulty in the case of the working man of being detached from his labour and of living for six months in an expensive metropolis, must show how visionary any such idea was. Their desire should be, however, to facilitate the introduction of working men into that House; and if they wished thus to get a real representation of the wishes and sentiments of the great bulk of the people they would diminish, as far as possible, the expenses of elections. He therefore had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he hoped the House would meet the Motion of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) with a direct negative. The hon. Member had distinctly stated that the Government would offer to refer the subject to the Select Committee which was to be appointed to consider election matters. He hoped the Government would be sufficiently firm to say either "Aye" or "No" to the second reading, as it was a matter which they must have maturely considered as it was so fully debated last year. It was perfectly true, no doubt, that the hon. Member for Brighton carried his clause on two occasions, but it was no less true that that clause was rejected last year by a very large majority. This was not only a very serious question in itself, but, if entertained, it might lead to the time of the House being occupied with a re-discussion of the Reform Act and other Acts connected with that measure. He trusted, therefore, that the House would nip this scheme in the bud by declaring that the Bill ought not to be read a second time. There were two reasons which ought to induce the House to take that course. In the first place there was the Motion brought forward the other evening respecting local taxation, which the Government had promised to inquire into; and he felt assured that that inquiry would conclusively show that the taxes pressed unfairly on house and landed property. Next there was the statement of the First Minister of the Crown that part of the surplus of the Irish Church revenues were to be given in lieu of certain portions of the county cess, which weighed heavily on the ratepayers in Ireland. Now, he maintained that the county rates were a great burden in England, and consequently he opposed the present Bill. One objection to it was that if a Member took Office in the Government the constituency would have to defray the cost of his re-election. He might multiply objections against the Bill; but on the present occasion he would content himself with expressing his belief that the House would act wisely in not assenting to the second reading.

MR. MUNTZ said, the expenses of returning officers were not the only expenses which candidates were required to meet, but still they formed no inconsiderable sum. He would remark that if the expense of providing polling-booths were thrown on the local authorities they would keep them from one election to another at a very trifling cost. Was it reasonable that they should punish a man because he set up as a candidate? Was it wise that they should secure that poor men should be excluded from Parliament? In his own borough (Birmingham) the expenses of the returning officer had amounted to about £2,177 at the last election. How, he would ask, could Chatham or Canning have entered Parliament if these expenses had been so heavy in former times? The ratepayers were willing to bear the burden, and why then should the House not permit them to do so? He hoped the House would agree to the second reading.

SIR HERBERT CROFT asked leave to raise, for the first time, his voice in that House, and he did so in opposition to the Bill, on behalf of the already overburdened yeomen of England, on whom this Bill, if passed, would impose an additional tax. He denied that they wished to be further taxed in respect of hustings expenses. A Herefordshire yeoman said to him the other day that he would see him further before he would pay such expenses. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) had not made out his case. Why did not the hon. Gentleman inform the House what kind of men the Bill was intended to benefit? There might be some reason for supposing that the measure was brought forward at the instigation of the leaders of the Reform League. The recent elections showed, however, that several members of that League were debarred from entering Parliament, not by the large amount of the expenses but by the votes of the working men, who had no confidence in such leaders. It was not the election expenses which prevented President Beales, magister artium, being returned for the Tower Hamlets, Mr. Bradlaugh for Northampton, and the gallant Colonel Dickson for the borough of Hackney. Then, again, the object of the Bill could hardly be to prevent what were known as hustings oppositions, for these occurred, even although the candidates had to give security for payment of their share of the expenses. He himself and his hon. Colleague one morning in November last proceeded to the Shire Hall in the city of Hereford surrounded by a body of staunch friends. Their better halves were in the gallery, their swords were on the table, and they laboured under the delightful delusion that they were about to be elected without opposition, but, at the last moment, an excellent man of business was proposed against whom it was not his intention to say a single word. The new candidate immediately entered into security for costs—which costs he would have to pay. The returning officer's expenses in Herefordshire amounted to £850, and as there is an election on the average every four years an additional burden of upwards of £200 would be imposed on the already overburdened yeomen. Although the amount was not very large, it was a step in the wrong direction. He was much pleased with the eloquent appeal which the First Minister of the Crown made the other evening for the poor of Ireland, and he only regretted that he (Sir Herbert Croft) could not imitate the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman, while pleading on behalf of the poor of this country, but with all the energy he possessed, with all his heart, he implored hon. Gentlemen to crush this measure, and if it were pressed to a division to vote against it in such numbers, that even the hon. Member for Brighton, with all his perseverance, would shrink from bringing it a fourth time under the consideration of the House.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he hoped it would not be regarded as very presumptuous if he rose to address the House so soon after the "crushing" speech which they had just heard. He should support the Bill: first, because it was based on a principle which asserted the true relations between a Member and his constituents; and, secondly, because it would widen the area of electoral choice, by affording a greater chance of procuring the services of men who, though not possessed of wealth, were yet endowed with all the necessary qualifications for representing the interests of constituencies. Everything which tended to lighten the burden of elections, not only from the shoulders of the candidates but from the constituents should be advocated in that House. Before the Reform Bills of 1832 and 1867, there were nomination boroughs which afforded an avenue to this House for men of ability and high attainments.

Now that the constituencies had been largely augmented and the area of electoral power had been extended he thought the House should enlarge also the area of the choice of representatives by diminishing the expenses of elections, and thus enabling men of moderate means to enter the House. He did not indulge any Utopian idea as to the working-class representation; but he fully agreed with the opinions of the Prime Minister, and of Earl Russell, that it would be a great advantage to that House, and that it would greatly assist their deliberations if they could have a direct representation of the working men, from whom they could hear directly what were the wants, the feelings, and the objects of the class to which they belonged. He agreed with the statement of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) that the relation of a Member to his constituency was that of one who undertook to perform a great public service. He ought not, therefore, to be burdened with the expense entailed by the necessary legal process by which he was returned. There were expenses in every election which would always fall heavily upon candidates. It is to be regretted that this should be so. But to call upon candidates to pay for the very machinery, so to speak, which the law imposed and required in order to carry out its own provisions, he confessed was an anomaly and a hardship not to be found under any representative system of government with which he was acquainted. Yet that is what now existed here, and what hon. Members who opposed the present Bill sought to perpetuate. In the olden time, and down to a period more recent than the Restoration, Members of the House of Commons were paid their expenses in coming to, remaining in, and returning to their homes. He did not mean to say that he was prepared to advocate a return to that system, but he referred to it in order to show what was originally the relation of a Member towards his constituents, and that in the conception of the law and the constitution it was one of service rendered to them by the Member, and not of service or advantage bestowed upon him. Hon. Gentlemen opposite who opposed the present measure were perpetuating what was the great source and the parent of corruption by cherishing the idea that the candidate who sought to be returned to that House was seeking a great benefit for himself, instead of conferring a benefit upon the public. The consequence was that he was expected not only to bear all the expenses of his election, but hereafter to engage in what he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) considered the most dangerous, because the most insidious, form of corruption. He was expected to become the systematic subsidizer of the borough he represented by contributing largely towards the support of local institutions and other like objects. He thanked the House for the indulgent hearing which they had given him, and would give his cordial support to the measure.

MR. FIELDEN said, he was of opinion that, as a Parliamentary election was a matter of national importance, the expenses of it ought, under ordinary circumstances to be borne by the nation. But while he entertained that opinion he was opposed to the Bill before the House, and he should state briefly the grounds on which his objection to it was based. The national taxation was £70,000,000; the local taxation, according to the very able statement of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon, was £21,000,000. It was said that the amount which would be added by the operation of this Bill to the local taxation of the country would be very insignificant; but it should not be forgotten that that taxation had reached its present large proportions by means of petty additions, and that it was necessary to watch with a jealous eye any further augmentation of the burden, however small. He had been somewhat amused, he must confess, at the statement which had been made by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) and the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines). They represented that their constituents were most anxious to be taxed for the purposes of this Bill. He knew nothing of Brighton, but he happened to represent the Eastern Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire, in which Leeds was situated. He had not received frequent communications from the freeholders of that borough, but the chief topic of all that he had received was the great pressure upon them of local taxation, with any addition to which they would not, so far as his experience went, be at all satisfied. He, for one, objected to see the expenses named in the Bill taken off the shoulders of candidates, and transferred to those of the already heavily-taxed ratepayer, and it would, he maintained, come with a very bad grace from the New Reformed Parliament if, before the questions of national or local taxation—to the diminution of which, as far as possible, so many hon. Members had pledged themselves on the hustings—had been touched, they were to pass a measure for the relief of their own pockets. Entertaining those views, he felt it to be his duty to oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. ANDERSON, as a representative of the largest constituency in the kingdom, hoped he might be allowed to say a few words on the subject before the House. He contended that the amount of the necessary expenses at elections was much greater as matters at present stood than it would be if the charge had to be borne by the ratepayers. In the borough which he had the honour to represent the claims of the returning officer at the recent election amounted to £1,400, or £350 for each candidate; but if the cost were thrown upon the public the requisite work would have been done for a much smaller sum. But the strongest argument in favour of the Bill was not that which was founded on the diminution of expense. To the great bulk of those whom he addressed the payment of £200 or £300 was, in all probability, a matter of trifling importance; but undoubtedly the necessity for incurring even that expense had a great effect in limiting the field from which constituencies might choose their Members; and if the House were anxious to avoid the charge of desiring to keep Parliamentary honours and political power in the possession of one class—namely, the class of very wealthy men—they must legislate in the direction proposed by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett). It should be remembered that in limiting the field from which constituencies might choose their Members, the House thereby tended to limit its own intellectual power.

MR. ASSHETON agreed in thinking that it would be a great misfortune if it should be laid down as an axiom that the longest purse should have the greatest chance of returning a Member to that House. It would, indeed, be a great misfortune if the number of pounds in a man's pocket should be taken as the measure of the amount of brains in his head; and it appeared to him that the question whether the House should say "Aye" or "No" to this Bill lay in a nutshell. Would the Bill, or would it not, increase the expenses of elections? He held that anything which tended to increase the expenses of elections diminished pro tanto the proper representation of the people in that House, and the reason why he should vote against the second reading of the Bill was that he thought it would have the effect of increasing those expenses. He would tell the House why. Most of them were aware that the sum paid for the returning officer's expenses was small compared with many other expenses which were incurred. But still the returning officer's expenses were those which made the most show to the outer world, and people thought that if they could get these expenses paid for them by the Legislature their election would cost nothing. If the Bill were to pass, one result of its operation would be to induce candidates to stand who had not the remotest chance of being returned, and thus to give rise to contests where, as matters at present stood, none would occur. Believing that that would be a great evil, and would increase instead of diminishing election expenses, he should vote against the second reading.

MR. M'MAHON said, that an Act of Parliament had been passed in 1820 with respect to Irish elections, providing that the expenses of returning officers should be borne by the county rate, but that they should be paid, in the first instance, by the sheriff. A second Act provided that those expenses should be very moderate, and the opinion generally prevailed in Ireland, and was often acted upon, that where there was no contest the sheriff could make no charge. It would, he thought, be advisable to introduce into the present Bill a clause embodying that principle, inasmuch as contests in those cases in which there was no chance of success on the one side would thereby be discountenanced.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON observed that the Act to which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. M'Mahon) referred had not been found to work well and had been repealed. As for the Bill of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), he looked upon it as a measure to provide additional candidates at elections at the expense of the ratepayers who had no wish to be subject to increased charge. If the constituents of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) were so desirous of taking upon themselves a fresh burden, with the view of enabling working men to get into Parliament with greater facility, what, he should like to know, was to prevent them from subscribing to effect that object? They had never done so, however, and what the supporters of the Bill really sought to effect was to obtain compulsory powers to tax persons who did not concur in their views. He hoped the House would not be deceived by the spurious pretence that this was a Bill to increase the area of intellectual ability in the House—for he believed under that disguise it was intended to add to the already overburdened rates of the country.

MR. HIBBERT said, the measure was a matter of indifference to himself personally, for his constituents had always paid his expenses; but he wished his opponent's expenses also to be paid. The chief objection to the Bill was the increase it would cause in the local taxation. Now, he admitted local taxation was already sufficiently heavy, but that was no reason why they should not endeavour to put the election expenses on a proper principle. Whether the expenses were to be placed on the local rates or on the Imperial funds was a matter for the consideration of the Committee when this Bill went before it. The question involved in the measure was, perhaps, very small, so far as the payment of those expenses was concerned; but then it was very great viewed as a matter of principle. He found from the Returns of the General Election of 1865 that out of the total expenditure on the elections for the United Kingdom, which amounted to £752,746, the sum charged for returning officers was only £47,320, and he felt assured that if the charges were levied as proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, it would be found that they would decrease very considerably. The fact that the expenses of registration were paid out of the rates was, he contended, another argument in favour of the Bill, for there could be no good reason for stopping short at that point and throwing the expenses of the election itself on the candidates.

penses before the House, nor had he, like the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Hibbert), any particular desire to save the pockets of his opponents, but he was anxious to have justice done to his constituents, who had no inclination whatever, either upon this or upon any other occasion, for an increase of the county rates. It had been argued by some Gentlemen opposite that the passing of this Bill would facilitate the entrance of working men to this House. He (Colonel Gilpin) did not think that members of the working classes would have a bit the better chance of obtaining seats in Parliament if the Bill were to pass than they had at present, while the expenses of elections would in all probability be increased rather than diminished by its operation. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), he could only say that on more than one occasion he had heard the senior Member for that town boast that his elections for Birmingham had never cost him a farthing, and he had reason to be proud of it. When the hon. Member was as well known and appreciated as his Colleague, no doubt the same thing would happen to him. But what would occur in the interim? Why, the enormous expenses of the returning officer would be thrown upon the ratepayers, many of whom found it difficult to pay the sum already demanded. He (Colonel Gilpin) had not experienced the luxury of a borough election, but he had stood three contested county elections, and the sole expenses of the returning officers had not in all the three elections, he believed, amounted to the enormous cost at one Birmingham election of £2,700.

MR. WALTER said, that having had a large experience in election contests he hoped the House would allow him to state that he did not think the passing of the Bill would have the effect either of enabling a greater number of working men to obtain seats in Parliament, or of breaking the back of that much-enduring animal the ratepayer by the small addition which it would make to the amount of his taxation. He was, however, of opinion that it was important to lay down a rule by which a clear distinction should be drawn between those charges which the law imposed upon candidates and the enormous expenses which they chose to impose upon themselves. From what he had heard on the subject from many of his constituents after a long and arduous contest—and his experience in the matter would, he felt convinced, be borne out by that of hon. Gentlemen round him—there existed a very general feeling on the part of large sections of electors of what he might term shame because of the large outlay which men who came forward to discharge to some extent a public duty were obliged to incur. The actual charges which came under the head of the expenses of the returning officer formed but an insignificant item in the long bill which the candidate was called upon to pay. But, comparatively small as those charges were, they would, he believed, be materially reduced if they had to be borne by the ratepayers. As things now stood many charges which were not strictly legal were mixed up with others which were considered to be legal and fell upon the shoulders of the candidate. The cost of erecting a hustings was not, he believed he was correct in saying, a strictly legal charge, and he, for one, should like to see the farce of nominations, with the erection of hustings, altogether done away with. If, however, these things must continue to be the inevitable accompaniments of a General Election, together with the expenses of employing polling clerks, and of furnishing copies of returns, multiplied to an indefinite extent, the cost should, in his opinion, be borne by the ratepayers, who would of course take very good care that it was cut down. Entertaining those views, he could not refuse to support the second reading of the Bill, but he should be better pleased to see it referred to the Committee which was so soon about to commence its labours. This was only one of a series of questions which would be better considered by the Committee than by this House. Among other modes of diminishing the expenses of elections, he believed that an increased number of polling-places in counties would have a very material effect. It would then be possible to do what could not be done at present—put an end to the enormous expense of carrying voters to the poll. You could not accomplish this object until greater facilities were given for voting than now existed; but, in the meantime, believing that, as a mere question of justice and of right, the principle laid down in the Bill was a sound one, he should be prepared to support the second reading.

MR. FLOYER wished, before the House came to a division, that they should understand what were the points on which they were about to vote. The hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) had suggested that this burden might be thrown upon the general taxation of the country; but he believed he was correct in stating that no such alteration could be introduced into a Bill of this character in Committee, and therefore hon. Members would vote on a false issue if they supported the second reading under this belief. Then it was argued that if the expense were thrown upon the ratepayers, they would reduce the expense. But he did not find in the Bill any provision for the ratepayers having any control over the expenses—all they had to do with them was to pay them. The necessary expenses of the Bill would not be in the least degree under the control of the ratepayers. If that were so it was a totally wrong induction from the premise of the hon. Member for Brighton, when he said his Bill would reduce the expenses of elections. But granting that it were so, might not the principle be carried further than that House would wish? We had heard of appeals to eminent men who had been asked to decide whether this or that candidate should stand for a certain constituency; and recently, in one of our largest boroughs, that question was settled in some secret mode by the electors. No doubt, election expenses might be got rid of in this way, but for his part he abhorred all such occult and unconstitutional practices. Elections ought to be conducted by the constituencies, before whom candidates should come openly, and anything in the nature of hole-and-corner proceedings should be discouraged. He feared that this Bill rather pointed in the direction of practices, the tendency of which was to keep down expenses in an unconstitutional way, and for this and other reasons he moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Floyer.)

pose the second reading, because he looked upon it as merely nibbling and meddling with a small part of a great question, and because he thought that a private Member should not attempt to deal with a question which within a very short time was to be dealt with by the Government. The Bill was incomplete, for unless you prohibited other than the mere hustings expenses you would be no nearer the object of allowing working men to become Members of Parliament. The measure would tax all municipalities on the contingency that some one or two of them might wish to return such Members. He would like that constituencies should have a free choice in this matter; but the Bill would not secure this result. No one could have observed the enormous expenses which the Election Judges in their recent inquiries had pronounced to be legal, without seeing that this Bill merely touched the skirts of a great question, and that we really had to deal with the larger question so ably referred to by the hon. Member (Mr. Walter). He would rather leave the Government to deal with the matter; and, representing a constituency where the municipal rates were very heavy already, he did not wish that one of the first votes of this House should be to impose fresh rates upon them and other constituencies. If constituencies wished to return working men, the way was open to them; they could do so by defraying the expenses of such candidates. For these reasons he should vote against the second reading.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS, being also about to vote against the Bill, wished to give his reasons for doing so. He entirely approved of the principle of the Bill, and thought it was extremely desirable to diminish election expenses; but the expenses dealt with by this Bill formed only about 7 or 8 per cent of the total expenses of candidates, and it was trifling with the subject to throw a burden like this upon taxpayers, who were taxed to the utmost already, without any adequate advantage or result to anybody. There were plenty of means by which the cost of elections might be reduced before throwing this fresh burden upon the local taxes. He could not agree with the observations of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Serjeant Simon), for he felt that the honour, the pleasure, and the satisfaction of being in this House were well worth the legitimate expenses of the election.

MR. AYRTON said, that the statement of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) that he would persevere with his Motion, whatever might be urged against it, had raised a spirit of contention which might otherwise have been avoided. It became extremely difficult to conduct Business in this House when an hon. Member began by declaring that he would take a course of his own, and would not listen to any appeal that might be made to him. The hon. Member for Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) had taken advantage of this to insist upon a final decision against the Bill, and to express a hope that the Government would be firm—and no doubt they would be so; but what was firmness upon this question? At the beginning of the Session it was stated that the Government would recommend that an inquiry should be prosecuted into the present mode of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, with a view to consider the possibility of providing any further guarantees for the tranquillity, the purity, and the freedom of such elections; and the House returned an Address to the Speech from the Throne, stating that it would probably proceed with that inquiry. Accordingly notice had been given that to-morrow a Motion would be made by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bruce) for the appointment of a Committee. His hon. Friend opposite (Colonel Barttelot), in his view of firmness, proposed that, pending the Notice for a Committee, the Government should at this moment pronounce a decided opinion, Aye or No, upon the three or four propositions in this Bill which must inevitably become part of the inquiry carried on by the Committee. Surely such a course on the part of the Government would be very inconsistent. At all events, he declined to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member. Many other proposals had been brought under the notice of the House, all tending to show that this Bill was only part of a large subject. When, however, the Government had announced that, in their opinion, there ought to be inquiry with a view to a change in the law, it was not usual to draw the House into a discussion of the subjects embraced in that inquiry, nor was it usual meanwhile to prevent hon. Members from submitting their proposals to the House. On the contrary, the ordinary course was to let every hon. Member lay his proposal before the House in such a shape that it might be referred to the Committee upstairs, who would consider whether it should or should not form part of any general measure. He thought, therefore, that the House might with great propriety allow the Bill to proceed through a stage to-day, and that this would be quite consistent with the course which the Government had advised the House to take. He had no intention to go further, because hon. Members would see that, if the Committee should think it desirable, for example, that the votes should be taken in an entirely new manner, then the expense to be incurred by it was a subject which must of necessity be considered, and an entirely new set of arrangements would have to be made. Again, it had been pointed out that the very foundation of this subject was what ought to be the expenses of the returning officers. On this point the English law was most defective, while in Ireland a most excellent law was in existence. The charges of election officers would, therefore, probably have to be regulated. At present, every hon. Member knew that he was a victim. The returning officer had said to him, "You must send me a check for the modest sum of £230," and if you inquired for particulars, the returning officer probably did not condescend to give any. All these points must be inquired into; and, having sat upon a Committee on this very subject, he knew it was full of practical difficulties which could not be slurred over. In this country the elections were in the hands of the people as the guardians of their own rights and freedom, and not, as in France, in the hands of officials; and, therefore, there was no ground for comparison between our elections and those elsewhere in Europe; but if they wanted a standard of comparison they should look to the other side of the Atlantic where the elections were also in the hands of the people. Gentlemen who complained of the cost of elections might console themselves by the reflection that if they had been candidates in the United States they would have had to spend a great deal more. The people in the United States, however, showed their spirit by voluntarily contributing largely towards the election expenses, but there was no law to prevent them from doing the same in this country. That being so, and there being no law to prevent any candidate from saying that he would incur no liability at all in respect of the election, it would not be right to exaggerate the importance of this Bill, nor was it right to support the Bill on the ground that it would promote what was called the direct representation of the working classes. If any hon. Member entertained a deep-seated conviction that the working classes ought to be represented there by members of their own body, he might effect his object by resigning in favour of a working man. But he (Mr. Ayrton) had never encouraged this sentimental feeling, because he knew the difficulties in the way of such a class representation, and believed that he could represent working men quite as well as a member of their own body. Entertaining this feeling, he had no intention of resigning his own seat, but he hoped the House would be consistent, and that the hon. Member opposite would not, in the face of the impending Committee, ask the House precipitately to come to a final conclusion upon the questions contained in this Bill. For his part he thought that the Bill should be read a second time, in order that it might hereafter be properly considered.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it was desirable, before the House came to a decision, to know the position in which it stood. His hon. Friend (Mr. Ayrton)—with a rhetoric which would remind the House rather of his position below the Gangway than of his present position on the Treasury Bench—had controverted the opinions of the hon. Member for Sussex (Colonel Barttelot). He asked the House to read the Bill a second time in order that it might hereafter be referred to a Committee. Such a course as this was wholly without precedent. If the House now passed the second reading it would affirm the principle of the Bill, and yet his hon. Friend evidently thought the Bill unsatisfactory and imperfect. In his opinion a Bill read a second time could not, with propriety, be referred to a Committee appointed to consider a general subject, though it might be referred to a Committee appointed specially to consider its provisions. However, as he was most desirous that the Committee should inquire into the very root of the whole matter, he should advise his hon. Friend (Mr. Floyer) to withdraw his Amendment for the second reading that day six months, and to move simply to postpone the Bill for such a period as would enable the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fawcett) to bring the Bill again before the House if the Select Committee sanctioned the principle. In that case the Bill would not be negatived but affirmed, and meanwhile no opinion would be pronounced upon it, pending the consideration of the measure by the Committee.

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, he felt some trepidation in consequence of the censure of the noble Lord (Viscount Bury) who accused him of presumption in "nibbling" at a great question. He was consoled, however, by remembering that the noble Lord had nibbled at a great constitutional question, and that his "nibbling" could not be half so unsuccessful as that of the noble Lord. The hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) had said that he pursued an unusual course in declaring that he would persevere with the measure. Now, he denied that it was an unusual course. The Bill was not a new one, and the present occupants of the Treasury Bench had expressed in the clearest terms their opinion respecting it. The hon. Gentleman had just made exactly the same kind of speech as had been made on a former occasion by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli). When he (Mr. Fawcett) had tried to introduce a clause on this subject into the Act passed by the right hon. Gentleman, he was asked to withdraw it, because it opened a large subject, because the law was uncertain, and it was a matter for further inquiry. He thought it his duty not to listen to that appeal, and who supported him? Why, the present Prime Minister and his Colleagues. They said it was a plain and simple question, one involving a great principle, and with their support he was twice successful. On that occasion he had persevered to the last, and on this occasion he would likewise persevere through every stage of the Bill.

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Life Insurance Companies, said, he proposed to extend to Life Insurance Companies the provisions enacted by Parliament last year with respect to Railway Companies and the fuller publication of their accounts.

MR. KINNAIRD thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the course he had taken, believing that no Bill that could be introduced this Session would confer greater benefit upon a class which the House was bound in every way to protect.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN observed that any well-considered measure on the subject would be supported by the Life Insurance Companies themselves.

MR. BARNETT expressed his regret that the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act of 1844 had not been made more use of in similar cases.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Life Insurance Companies, ordered to be brought in by MR. STEPHEN CAVE, MR. BAXLEY, and MR. RUSSELL GURNEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 35.]

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

LORD ELCHO, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Game Laws in Scotland, said, the Bill he proposed to introduce was one which was brought in during the last Parliament, and referred to a Select Committee upstairs. The Bill came down from that Select Committee in an amended form in the Session of 1867. There were two Bills before the Committee, one of them being the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan), and the other that which had been introduced by himself, and which was accepted as the basis of the Bill framed by the Committee. He had now to ask leave to re-introduce and re-print that Bill. The hon. Member for Linlithgowshire had already obtained leave to bring in a Bill, which, he believed, was practically identical with the one he brought in in 1867. He (Lord Elcho) proposed in his Bill to print an Amendment, which would have the effect of bringing the Bill to a certain extent back to the position in which it stood when it went before the Committee, so that the House would be in a position to legislate upon the subject with a full knowledge of what was done by the preceding Parliament in the Session of 1867.

MR. KINNAIRD said, although he believed it was perfectly true that the Bill, for the introduction of which the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had moved, was the result of an inquiry which took place before a Select Committee, he thought it was hardly fair to describe it as the Bill of that Committee, seeing that the provisions it contained were only carried in that Committee by a small majority. He did not rise to oppose the introduction of the Bill; but he thought it only fair that he should state that the Bill did not represent the views of the whole of the Committee any more than it could be said to have represented the feeling of all who had an interest in the question with which it dealt.

LORD ELCHO said, he trusted to the courtesy of the House to be allowed to say a word in explanation of what had fallen from the hon. Member opposite. All that he meant to imply was that it was a measure which had been examined by a Select Committee, and that it was generally concurred in and introduced as the result of the labours of that Committee. No doubt it was quite true that divisions did occur in the Committee; but still the result of those divisions led to the introduction of the Bill. With respect to any difference of opinion, all he could say was that if the measure did not represent the views of his hon. Friend, at all events it represented the views of the majority of the Committee; and he was, therefore, justified in the statement that it was the Bill of the Select Committee, and in that form he asked for leave to introduce it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Game Laws in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Lord ELCHO and Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY.

GENERAL VALUATION, &C. (IRELAND).

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS BILL.
(NO. 7.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said:—My Lords, the object of this Bill is to remedy some of the evils to which I ventured casually to draw the attention of your Lordships some nights ago. The evils in question are patent and well-known, and neither proof nor description of them will be required by any of your Lordships who have had experience of a late period of the Session in this House. It is notorious that a large part of the business which occupies this House has been brought forward at a late period of the Session, when not only Members of the House, but all who have any work in it, are quite exhausted, when the temperature is wholly unfavourable to any exertion, when a great number of Members of both Houses have left town, and when obviously nothing but the most perfunctory consideration can be given to any subjects submitted to your attention. Now, I do not, as has sometimes been represented, complain of it as though it were an injury inflicted on us by the House of Commons. It is not, indeed, a question of where Bills originate. It may be very right that a large number of Bills should originate in the other House, and we know that a certain class of them must, according to the usage of Parliament, originate there. Moreover, in the case of any Bill brought forward by a Department, the head of which sits in the House of Commons, it is only natural that he should wish to introduce them himself, and to make his own speech in explanation of his own measure, instead of handing over his work to some one else. The amount of business originating here will always, therefore, depend on the precise Offices which are held by the Ministers sitting in this House, and this, I apprehend, is a state of things which no legislation can alter. I do not then complain of the House of Commons: what I complain of is that we are not taking steps to remedy an evil which arises out of the very nature of things. We have five months in which to pass a large amount of legislation through the two Houses of Parliament, and those five months are utterly insufficient for the purpose as matters are now managed. It is true that for many centuries the time proved sufficient; but you have twice altered the constitution of the House of Commons, and on both occasions you have largely increased the power of the House, thus drawing within its view a large number of subjects which previously were left to be dealt with by the Executive Government; while you have increased the number of those who are anxious to establish their right to the position which they hold by showing their constituents that they take an active and intelligent part in the conduct of Public Business. The result is that the number of subjects brought before the House of Commons has been constantly increasing, and the desire to speak on those subjects has been increasing at the same time; while the time allotted for disposing of the business of the country has remained unaltered. Some people say it is the pheasants; but I should rather say, less cynically, it is the love of the gentlemen of this country for the festivities and amusements belonging to Christmas which forbids the meeting of Parliament for any real business at an earlier period than February. The conditions of temperature forbid our sitting later than the beginning of August, or, for any useful purpose, than the end of July, and the result is that the time at the disposal of Parliament remains exactly where it was, while the business, from the causes to which I have adverted, has increased in a geometrical ratio, and will increase still further. Under these circumstances I invite your Lordships to consider whether there is any reason in the Constitution or in common sense for allowing this shortness of time to make absolutely futile three-fourths or seven-eighths of the labours of Parliament during any ordinary Session. Owing to a rule of the Constitution—the origin of which nobody can discover, and of which it is impossible to say more than that we find it here—if when August comes your labours have not advanced beyond a certain point, those labours must be abandoned as far as legislation is concerned. All that you have done goes for nothing. If a Bill has been considered in great detail by a Select Committee, the Committee must sit and go through the details again; if it had to face a powerful opposition, all that opposition must be faced again. All the works, all the debates, all the enormous labour which attends the passing of any change, however small, in the laws which govern us must be gone through again, in order to reach the goal which you had nearly reached when the Prorogation arrived. Now is there in the nature of things any reason for this practice? Does it commend itself to any man's common sense? Do we act in this manner in any other department of life? Supposing you made it a rule to give up writing letters at a certain hour, would you throw all unfinished ones into the fire, or begin next morning at the point where you left off? Is there any body of men, in any kind of business, that adopt what I must call this senseless practice, that whatever you have not finished by a certain time you must begin again next year? I have never heard any reason for such a rule. There is nothing but the bare inert weight of unmeaning custom to justify a principle which wastes so much of the labour and utility of Parliament. By the present Bill, then, I ask your Lordships to take a step to remedy this obstruction—I ask you to recognize the physical fact that there is not sufficient time within five months for the completion of the business which the two Houses have to perform, and to allow either House, under proper precautions, to begin next year at the point where it left off the year before. It has been said that the Prerogative of the Crown would be injuriously affected if the Crown could not terminate all Bills before Parliament by a Prorogation. Against that objection I have guarded by a clause which makes the Assent of the Crown necessary to the resumption of proceedings on a Bill at the point which it had reached at the close of the preceding Session. It has also been said that either House might feel jealous of the exercise of the power thus given by the other House. I have guarded against that by making the ultimate consent of the other House necessary after such proceedings have been resumed and brought to a conclusion. The Bill, therefore, not only guards against any infringement of any part of the Constitution, but against any possible jealousy that the power it gives might excite as between the two Houses. I hold, indeed, that it is a Bill for the relief not of one House, but of both Houses. I have often seen Bills in the House of Commons which had been sent down by your Lordships discussed at the end of the Session by a mere tail, including, if I may be allowed to use the term, the Members of Her Majesty's Government. I remember hearing the present Prime Minister say—he was then in Opposition—that at the end of the Session the Government were able to pass anything, and that is strictly the fact; for the House of Commons, like the House of Lords, is then so exhausted and thin that the Government of the day can force through any measure, being by the attendance of its Members practically master of the decisions of the House. It would surely be a great relief to the House of Commons if, when early in August some Bill came down to them, they could suspend proceedings to the following year, and if in those early days of the Session, when the Members of the House of Commons like your Lordships have little to do, they could resume those proceedings. The truth is that even of the time we have before us we make the most wretched and uneconomical use. Even the House of Commons is open to this reproach—that they crowd all their business into May, June, and July; February, March, and to some extent, April also, not being thoroughly employed. Again and again have I seen night after night wasted in February because business was not ready; whereas they might have been devoted to Bills put aside in the previous Session for want of time. I venture, then, to urge this Bill earnestly on your Lordships' attention, because I hold it to be a remedy for the evil, and because I think it of the first importance that the evil should be remedied, and that this House should be brought into a state of thorough efficiency, without any step being taken that can excite jealousy or ill-will between the two Houses. It appears to me, moreover, that it will tend to remove one great reproach which is cast upon our system of Government. Of late years people have doubted whether Parliamentary Government, as at present conducted, is adequate in its vigour and rapidity to the constantly occurring exigencies of such a nation as this, and there is no doubt that the power of delay, or rather the involuntary pressure which drives all parties towards delay, has been excessive of recent years. There is subject after subject calling for the consideration of the Legislature; laws known by every party to require investigation and alteration, which the mere vis inertiae of Parliament prevents us from undertaking. I do not say that for Bills of the first magnitude—Bills like the Reform Act of 1867, or like that which is now pending in another House—such a power as I propose to give by this Bill is needed, or would be rigidly exercised, for Bills as to which great public excitement exists would probably always be disposed of in a single Session. Nor do I say that for a considerable number of very small Bills, which under any other system of Government would be disposed of by Orders in Council and are matters fairly within the discretion of the several Departments, this power is necessary. There are however a vast number of intermediate Bills—legislation of the second order as I may call it—of which I may take the Bankruptcy Bill as a fair type, which are stopped year after year, and the delays in which are a perfect disgrace and scandal to Parliament. Those Bills do not in general excite any great party opposition, but they are thrust aside and crushed in the hot conflict of parties, and thus fail to come to fruit in legislation precisely for want of some such power as this Bill proposes. I earnestly hope, therefore, that your Lordships will accept it, and will help me in carrying it, so that we may make this much needed reform in the practice of our proceedings.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, before entering upon the subject of the Bill proposed by the noble Marquess, who has already earned the gratitude of the House for the earnestness with which he applies himself to everything that can improve the order and value of our proceedings, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say one or two words to show that I am not totally unworthy to speak on the subject itself. Your Lordships will remember that, during the somewhat irregular conversation a few nights ago to which the noble Marquess has alluded, he himself, and other noble Lords opposite were good enough to express in courteous terms their confidence in my endeavours to further the wishes of the House in this respect. My noble Friend on the cross-Benches (Earl Grey)—impatient, probably, of such unmerited compliments—jumped up and denounced me to the House as the individual principally responsible for the mischief and delay which exist. I do not know whether any of your Lordships ever saw an old play in which one actor says to another, “Let me treat you as a friend—come and join the family dinner.” The other actor, alarmed, says, “Nay, don’t treat me as a friend, for I like good living.” Now, I always have a little of that feeling when I get into a political difference with one of my own personal friends. But at the same time I admit I would rather be attacked every day by my noble Friend than lose a jot of that friendship which I value so much. My noble Friend could not, of course, have meant that I was the original cause of a grievance which, as we know, has been complained of for more than sixty-five years; and, indeed, I find, from an analysis made by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) that the evil existed to such an extent that the year before I entered this House 132 Bills were passed, of which only twenty-three originated here, 109 in the House of Commons, and, of the 132 Bills, no less than sixty-three, or one-half of the whole number, were submitted to your Lordships in the last six weeks of the Session. But what I understand my noble Friend complained of was this, of my having moved, as the organ of the Government, the suspension of a Standing Order, proposed by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, which prevented the second reading of Bills after a certain period of the Session. Now, all I can say in my justification is that every year when that Motion was renewed, I used almost the same words as Lord Aberdeen had made use of on a previous occasion, when he protested against the supposition that any Government could possibly consent to a perfectly strict interpretation of such a Resolution. I do not deny that, if we adopt Resolutions, we ought to adhere to them, and that we should therefore be very careful what we adopt; but I cannot think that if a different course had been taken on the occasion in question, it would really have been to the advantage of the House. My noble Friend (Earl Grey) referred to a Bill which he thought at the time, and still thinks, was bad. Now, I will not enter into its merits or demerits, but it was one which it is quite clear he was anxious to destroy by any weapon that came to his hand. Rightly or wrongly, that Bill was desired by a very large portion of the mercantile community, and I am afraid that it would have been thought by the public that there was something like a “strike” on our part if we had refused to apply our minds to legislation at that particular moment, when, whatever you do, a great press of legislation is sure to occur. This would apply to the noble Marquess’s warning that if any Government brought up measures at too late a period he should make use of every form of the House to obstruct them. That form of proceeding has been had recourse to before now, very often with success, but never with success in the long run. The House would, at last, revolt against it, and public opinion would be almost sure to think of us, as an eminent divine once said of some people, that “they appeared to take as much pains to be damned as would have worked out the salvation of their souls.” If for several evenings we were to devote our attention to obstructing a Bill, people would think that time might as well have been employed in amending either the substance or the form of it. I am glad to find that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has turned his attention to a different mode of dealing with the question. No Bill could have less of a party character than this. A similar Bill was introduced by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) some twenty years ago. It was opposed by Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell, and the noble Chairman of Committees (Lord Redesdale); but it was strongly supported by Lord Lansdowne, and was sent down to the House of Commons, where it was supported by Earl Russell. There happened to be a Committee sitting at the time on the despatch of Public Business; composed of my noble Friend then Lord

John Russell, Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Hume, and other gentlemen representing different shades of opinion. They examined three witnesses, one of them being the noble Lord who at that time was Speaker of the House of Commons (Viscount Eversley), and also—although I am almost afraid of mentioning it before the noble Marquess—the “intelligent foreigner;” and, after going through that process, without giving any reason, and apparently without any division, they agreed not to recommend the Bill to the adoption of the House of Commons. The noble Marquess has stated very clearly the reasons which tell in favour of this proposal, and, if he adopts the course which I shall venture to suggest, it will be unnecessary for me to state what appear to me to be some objections to it. It is quite clear that the objections which actuated that Committee are likely to have the same weight now with the House of Commons if we send the measure down to be considered by them in a similar manner, and I would recommend the House to give a second reading to the Bill, after which Her Majesty’s Government should pledge themselves to appoint a Joint Committee of both Houses with regard to the distribution of business between them. I need not trouble your Lordships with the precedents for appointing a Joint Committee, as a few years ago that course was taken with regard to schemes for railway communication in the metropolis, the precedents I then stated being considered conclusive. We had a preliminary meeting; whether it had the effect of smoothing matters I do not know, but the businesslike way in which the Committee went through what they had in hand was quite remarkable. There was not the slightest feeling of jealousy on the part of Members of either House; the decisions, after a good deal of discussion, were unanimous except on one point, on which a division arose accidentally, apparently on purpose to show that, on the one hand, there was no party spirit, and, on the other, no esprit de corps as regarded the two Houses, and no reference to party—two Peers voting on one side, and two on another, as also an equal number of Commoners—one of each being a Conservative, and the other a Liberal. I should recommend, if such a Joint Committee be appointed, that this Bill be referred to it, but not this Bill alone. The noble Earl (Earl Russell), with his great Parliamentary experience, made a suggestion the other night as to the termination of the financial year which might fitly be referred to it, as also a subject which was brought forward at the time of the discussion of the former Bill, —namely, a scheme for preventing the slipslop wording of Acts of Parliament, of which the public and legal authorities have so much right to complain. Her Majesty’s Government, partly with a view to economy, but also with a view to efficiency, have already created a Department, at the head of which is a gentleman meriting the confidence both of the late and the present Government—Mr. Thring—so that all Government Bills may go through the same hands and may be accurately and consistently worded. I think that in Committee some suggestion might be made as to the use of such a Department, in connection possibly with officers of both Houses, so as to exercise some little check and give some advice on the phraseology of Bills. There is another point of more importance to which I prefer alluding only in the most indirect way. It is one which certainly would not properly emanate from this House, but I know that many eminent Members of the House of Commons have a very strong feeling that the straining of some of their privileges is of no use whatever in a constitutional point of view, and is inconvenient, not only to the public and to your Lordships, but also to that House. I should hope that in such a Committee some proposition on that subject might be made which would come more gracefully from Members of the other House than from Members of this. This is the course I venture to suggest; and if it is agreeable to your Lordships I shall make it my duty, in communication with the head of the Government in the other House, to move for the appointment of a Committee of the character I have described.

LORD REDESDALE said, he did not think the country suffered from the want of sufficient legislation, for, on the whole, he thought it had rather too much than too little. One of the great evils which the country suffered from was the want of proper preparation of the Bills submitted to Parliament. There were very few, properly drawn, which found any difficulty in getting through Parliament. He could mention an instance of the value of such preparation. Up to 1845 there had been no general legislation respecting railways; but the railway mania then commencing, and it being evident that a great deal of business would come before Parliament, the Government of the day thought it their duty to bring forward general Bills to be applied to all railways. Accordingly, on the 6th of February—two days after the opening of the Session—the Companies Clauses Bill, the Lands Clauses Bill, and the Railways Clauses Bill for England and Scotland were introduced, each containing from 150 to 160 clauses, and, notwithstanding their voluminous character, they received the Royal Assent on the 8th of May. A few short supplementary Bills on points which they did not touch had since been necessary, but he believed not a single clause in those elaborate Acts had been repealed. This showed how business could be got through when it was properly prepared; but, unfortunately, important Bills were hardly thought of till the Session had actually commenced, when draftsmen were very much employed, and being very imperfectly drawn they required so much consideration and amendment that frequently there was not sufficient time to carry them through. Now, he feared that the operation of the present Bill would rather tend to promote the careless drawing and late introduction of Bills, and he should be glad if both Houses would agree not to give a second reading to Bills containing a given number of clauses unless, with the exception of certain specified Bills, they were introduced during the first month of the Session. Measures ought to be prepared before Parliament met and be introduced early, so that an opinion might be formed upon them, and good legislation would then be facilitated. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had justly said that his proposal would not be applicable to strong party Bills; and he (Lord Redesdale) could conceive nothing more mischievous than that such Bills, failing to pass one Session, should be resumed by the other House the following Session. Something might be said in favour of the plan as regarded a particular class of Bills; but he could not see why—taking the Bankruptcy Bill as an example—the noble Lord on the

Woolsack should not introduce here a similar Bill to that to be submitted to the Commons, and why their Lordships should not discuss it in detail. They would not improbably get through the measure before it reached Committee in the House of Commons; and being sent down to the Commons it might be taken up there and sent back to this House with Amendments at a later period of the Session. If the Bill had advanced so far in Committee that it was not expedient to send it down to the Commons, all its details would have been considered by their Lordships early in the Session, without waiting for the passage of the Bill through the other House. His plan seemed to him more desirable than resuming the consideration of a Bill which had not been passed in the previous Session. He had a strong constitutional objection too, to the principle of determining the proceedings of Parliament by statute. Everything now proposed could be effected by Standing Orders, which had the advantage of being much more easily altered; and at this very time the House were about to experience the inconvenience of the other course, for there were certain conditions as to Railway Bills imposed by an Act of last Session, some of which the companies might not have entirely fulfilled, the result of which would be that however trivial the omission they would be obliged to reject the Bills; whereas had the conditions been Standing Orders, they might have been dealt with in a more satisfactory way. He hoped, therefore, the Committee, if appointed, would consider the expediency of proceeding by Standing Orders rather than by Act of Parliament. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) proposed that the Assent of the Crown should be necessary to the resumption of Bills; but it would be most unconstitutional to require that assent to proceedings in Parliament before the Bill went to the Sovereign for assent. At the same time it was no doubt just that power should be given to the Crown to stop a Bill by prorogation. If both Houses adopted a rule allowing a Member to move the suspension of the Standing Orders in the case of a Bill which had been introduced at a proper time and had received full discussion in the preceding Session, so as to take it up at the third reading or at the report, the object desired by the noble

Marquess would be attained, and the only discussion necessary would be on the suspension of the Standing Orders; while this manner of proceeding would be in accordance with the forms and privileges of Parliament. He might remind their Lordships that the Bill of Lord Derby was referred by the Commons to a Committee then sitting, which had been appointed to consider the best mode of promoting the dispatch of Business in that House, who reported that they did not think it advisable to recommend it for adoption by the House. On that Committee were Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel, Sir George Grey, Sir James Graham, Mr. Hume, Mr. Disraeli, Sir Robert Inglis, Mr. Bernal, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Henley, Mr. Denison, and other distinguished Members, and at one of their meetings they adopted a recommendation that, in order to facilitate legislation, the House of Commons should not insist on its privileges in respect of any Bill or clause brought down from this House whereby tolls, rates, or duties were authorized, imposed, or regulated, provided such duties were levied by local authorities, or for local purposes, and were not applied to the public service. Unfortunately, however, that Resolution was rescinded at a subsequent sitting. Such a relaxation of the privileges of the House of Commons would have facilitated business, and would not have prejudiced the full jurisdiction justly claimed by that House over the taxation of the country, for local rates come within quite a different category. He should be glad if so reasonable a proposal were again made, but he agreed with the noble Earl (Earl Granville) that it would emanate more gracefully from Members of the House of Commons than from any of their Lordships. Having stated the objections which he entertained to this Bill he should content himself by saying "Not content" to the second reading.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, my apology for offering any observations to your Lordships after the remarks of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), may, perhaps, be found in the fact that, although my Parliamentary recollection does not go so far back as sixty-five years, the period mentioned by the noble Earl, twenty-one years have elapsed since I introduced a Bill in substance identical, and in most of its provisions similar with the measure now before the House. I regret that my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) has encountered from the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees the same opposition which I encountered on that occasion; but I trust that, notwithstanding the weight to be attached to the authority of the noble Lord, the House has not altered its opinion in the course of a generation, and that it still regards the evil in question as one deserving of some remedy, and that it will sanction the Bill of my noble Friend. The noble Marquess has pointed out that the increase of Parliamentary Business has greatly aggravated an evil which was at that time felt so keenly. My noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) was himself so convinced of the evil that he himself, a few years ago, came forward with a remedy; and the remedy he proposed was an addition to the Standing Orders, to the effect that this House would not take into consideration any Bills which were sent up from the other House of Parliament after a certain date, except in cases of real urgency. That proposition was one which, had it been adhered to, would, to a certain extent, have diminished the evil. But what occurred? I think in the very Session in which it was agreed to the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) moved that a certain Bill brought up late in July was one of urgency, and required to be immediately considered; he moved the suspension of the Standing Order in respect of that measure, and the Order was suspended. My noble Friend the Chairman of Committees has urged that to proceed by Standing Orders with reference to the Business of the House is preferable to legislation, because Standing Orders can be suspended in case of necessity. Now that is the very objection I take to proceeding by Standing Orders. Your Lordships are aware that while at the beginning of the Session you have scarcely any business, towards the close of it, in the month of July, when the House is thin and everybody is going out of town, you are inundated by a flood of Bills sent up from the House of Commons. That evil is admitted on all hands; and it is also admitted that at that period of the Session Her Majesty's Government, whatever party is in power, have practically an absolute control over all the business introduced into this House. If, therefore, a Bill which may have met a well-founded opposition in the House of Commons, but has passed that House, should come up to your Lordships in the latter part of July, the Government have every facility for pressing it through the House; but in doing so—in exercising their discretion for that purpose—they inevitably lower the character of this House, expose it to the charge of passing important measures without adequate consideration, and degrade it into a mere registry of the acts of the House of Commons. And this is the case not only with measures in which your Lordships may be reasonably supposed to take a special interest; but it is so often with regard to measures which have no political character at all. The other House may have devoted three or four months to the careful consideration of a measure quite irrespective of party; it comes up to your Lordships towards the end of July; it consists, perhaps, of a great many clauses, some of them of a very important character. But you have no time to consider them. And what is your present alternative? You must either reject them, and so throw on the House of Commons the labour and duty of considering them all over again in the ensuing Session, or of passing them without having subjected them to a careful inquiry and consideration. That difficulty this Bill seeks to avoid; but my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees says that the tendency of the Bill will be to increase hasty legislation. Now, it seems to me that the effect of the Bill would be exactly the reverse. It would prevent hasty legislation, and would relieve us from the alternative of passing a Bill without Amendment and without proper deliberation, or of rejecting it altogether, and so rendering futile the labours of a whole Session in the House of Commons. How my noble Friend can say that a provision which will enable us to take up a Bill at any stage, or to consider it with reference to debates that were begun in another Session—to take it up at a time when we would otherwise have no business at all, and therefore when we are able to give it a careful and deliberate consideration—how he can say that that will encourage hasty legislation I cannot understand. My noble Friend also says that if Bills were proposed before the opening of the Session, and if no elaborate Bills were allowed to be brought in after a certain date, measures would be properly considered, and there would be no need of subsequent Amendments. He instanced cases with which he is very conversant, the Companies Clauses and other Acts, which he says were so carefully drawn that they have required no Amendment. With all respect, however, for my noble Friend, I think there is not one of those Bills which has not been repeatedly amended; and, though I do not deny the desirability of Bills being carefully worded, I do not see how you can enforce that provision upon this or the other House, or how you can prevent any individual Member from introducing Bills at any period of the Session. My noble Friend asks why both Houses should not proceed pari passu with a measure—take the Bankruptcy Bill, for instance, which is about to be introduced in the House of Commons. But, however carefully such a Bill may have been drawn, how can you prevent Members either in this or in the other House of Parliament, from moving Amendments, and that clauses involving points of great legal importance and difficulty may be introduced without reference to the other clauses? It is this in fact that leads to so much confusion now, for, when you come to interpret them, lawyers say it is impossible that the House of Commons could have meant the same thing in two clauses of a Bill when they use different language in each; while the fact is, that, practically, they did mean the same thing, only they did not calculate the effect of alterations in one part of the Bill upon other parts. But suppose the same Bill were introduced by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack into this House—can your Lordships imagine a greater hotch-potch than would be produced if we were to be employed amending clauses that were struck out in the Commons, while we struck out a clause that was amended there; and at last the two Bills would be interchanged, and we might have two Bills of 250 clauses each, mutually contradicting each other. Of all devices for increasing the complications of carrying Bills through Parliament, I think my noble Friend's device is one which is the least likely to produce anything but confusion. As to proceeding by Standing Orders rather than by legislation, we see how easily the former are suspended, so that the immovability of the latter, which my noble Friend looks upon as a disadvantage, I regard as a decided advantage. Standing Orders are suspended at the caprice of the House, and the instance mentioned by my noble Friend of a Resolution being carried one day and rescinded on another, shows the disadvantage of proceeding in that way. I understood the noble Earl opposite, (Earl Granville), in acceding to the second reading of the Bill, to do so on the understanding that it should be referred, with a variety of other subjects, to a Joint Committee of both Houses. If the noble Earl proposes that this Bill be referred to a Committee of the two Houses impartially chosen—as no doubt it would be—and numbering among its members men whose opinion is entitled to authority, and if the Committee be confined to the consideration of the objects of this Bill, the little experience that I have had of such Joint Committees would certainly induce me to place great reliance and credit upon the Resolutions at which they might arrive. But if the noble Earl proposes to refer to that Joint Committee not only the Bill of my noble Friend, but a variety of other matters embracing such topics as the privileges of the House, and the course of proceeding with regard to other departments of business, I fear that my noble Friend the noble Marquess will find the support given him by the noble Earl opposite to be of a very fallacious character, and the probable result will be that his Bill will be swamped, and my noble Friend will get in lieu of it a Standing Order which will be at all times liable to suspension at the caprice of the Minister. While I thus support the principle and the main provisions of the Bill—if I might venture to make a suggestion to the noble Marquess—I would refer to one or two of the provisions of the Bill. I trust I should be the last to bring in question any of the Prerogatives of the Crown, but I own I do not understand what is the object of that provision that the consent of the Crown is to be necessary—not for the introduction, but for the resumption of a Bill at the former stage. The consent of the Crown is not required to be given before the Bill is introduced into the House of Commons; and if the Bill did not require the consent of the Crown on its first introduction, why should that consent be required for its resumption in the next Session? and why should the consent of the one House be required to the resumption of a Bill by the other House when it is clear that that consent has been given when the Bill was passed by the House in which it originated? Then my noble Friend proposes that the progress of the Bill should depend on a Motion agreed to in both Houses, that it is expedient that the consideration of the Bill should be resumed. I do not understand the object of that. It is enough to place the Bill at that exact stage of proceeding where it would have been if its consideration had been continued in the former Session. There may be some technical reason for this—I confess I do not see it—that at a certain stage, even in the Session of its introduction, it is competent to discharge the Order for its consideration, and therefore it may be desirable to require the consent of both Houses for its resumption. But I think the Government may be hardly treated by the operation of this provision. We all know that at the close of a Session the Government has the control of the business in this House, and that the passage of Bills is entirely in its hands. Now if this measure passed this might happen—Objections are, perhaps, taken to the Bill, and the Government say that the objections are fair and reasonable, and that they will not, therefore, exercise the power they possess and force the Bill through the House, but that they will consent to its being adjourned for consideration to another Session. I think it would not be treating the Government with good faith if, at the commencement of the following Session, the Opposition in this or the other House of Parliament, when the House is full and the Government have not the same control, were to turn round and say, “We won’t allow this Bill to be taken up; we won’t take it into consideration again.” I think that would be doing an injustice, and would lead the Government to exercise their power of pushing on or opposing the measure at the end of the previous Session of Parliament, if they could not rely upon its being taken into fair and deliberate consideration on the re-assembling of Parliament. There is only one other point. It is not made quite clear in what position the Bill, at the completion of its stages, should be sent back to the House in which it originated. My noble Friend does not distinctly say that it should be taken up in the same form as an amended Bill, but I think this should be distinctly understood. I certainly agree that when the Bill is sent down to the House of Commons it should not be necessary to go through the various stages as with a new Bill, but that it should be treated as an amended Bill. But the effect of that would be that, if no Amendments were made in this House, the Commons would be precluded from making any Amendments. Now it would, in my opinion, be highly desirable that on such a Bill going back to the House of Commons, even though this House has made no Amendments, yet the other House should have the opportunity of re-considering its details, and even of moving Amendments, in their own Bill. I think this would be perfectly fair. They may have neglected some details, and it is right they should have the opportunity of correction. But, subject to these observations, I cannot but think that the principle of this Bill is beneficial, and notwithstanding the remarks of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, I do not think it will tend to encourage hasty legislation. I think the measure will have the effect of giving both Houses of Parliament a full opportunity of examining the Bills that come before them, and that it will relieve this House from the painful alternative of either absolutely rejecting a Bill or of passing it without examination. I think, too, that it will promote beneficial legislation by supplying to your Lordships' House ample materials for discussion at the commencement of the Session. I am glad to hear that it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to oppose the second reading of the Bill, but I must confess that I heard with some anxiety and alarm of the additional matter which the noble Earl opposite proposes to submit to the consideration of the Committee.

EARL RUSSELL said, he perfectly remembered the Committee of the House of Commons to which the noble Earl had referred. He could not remember all the arguments that were used, but he remembered that he was in favour of the Bill introduced by the noble Earl as a useful piece of legislation. But there were two Members of that Committee—Sir Robert Peel, whose opinion of course always carried with it great authority, and Mr. Goulburn, who was not only highly respected, but who had peculiar knowledge of the usages and proceedings of Parliament, and who was therefore listened to with great respect on all questions of that kind—Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Goulburn opposed the Bill, and gave the Committee such arguments against it that it was rejected. He considered the Bill of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) was founded upon that Bill, and that it would materially improve and facilitate the work of legislation. There was one point in which he certainly agreed with the noble Earl who had just sat down. Supposing a Bill had passed through one House of Parliament, and Amendments were made to it in the other House, when the amended Bill was sent back to the House in which it originated, according to the usages of Parliament no clause could be touched unless Amendments had been made upon that clause. But when, after a year's delay, the Bill had been resumed and sent back to the other House with perhaps considerable alterations, it might perhaps seem to a majority of the other House that further alterations were very desirable. The House, therefore, ought to have the power not only of altering any clauses that had been amended, but of amending their own Bill as originally agreed to. He only desired to make one other remark, and that was in reference to the proposal made by his noble Friend relating to the subjects to be considered by the Joint Committee. If they were told that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, or any other Member of the Government, was prepared to submit any proposals to the Committee on those subjects, he should be inclined to give his support to his noble Friend's suggestion; but if, on the contrary, his noble Friend had no proposals on which the Government had agreed to suggest, and if the only object was to fish from the various Members for hints or advice which might be useful in that case, he certainly agreed in the opinion that such a course would involve a great waste of time. His consent, therefore, to that course, or rather his vote, would entirely depend upon his noble Friend informing him whether the Government were prepared to make any proposals which they had agreed to for the consideration of the Committee. He need only say that he should wish to see this Bill proceeded with as soon as possible in their Lordships' House, and sent down to the other House of Parliament.

LORD CAIRNS: I am sure your Lordships are very much indebted to my noble Friend who has proposed this Bill, both for the earnest manner in which he has addressed himself to the task of improving the arrangement of Business in this House, and also for the very practical manner in which he has brought the whole process of our proceedings to the test of his measure. I do not rise to say a word on the principle of the Bill. I entirely concur in it, and in thinking that its adoption would be attended with those great advantages which have been referred to by noble Lords who have spoken much more effectively on the subject than I am able to do. But I rise to say that I think the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) takes too gloomy a view of the prospects of a Bill of this kind if your Lordships should think fit to pass it and send it down to the other House of Parliament. It is quite true that in 1848 a Bill to improve the arrangement of our proceedings was sent down from this House, and did not receive the approbation of the other House. But what is the history of that measure? That Bill was proposed to your Lordships' House, and having been read a second time in your Lordships' House, was referred to a Select Committee and carefully considered by that Committee before it was read a third time and sent down to the House of Commons, where a Select Committee on Public Business happened to be at that time sitting. It was referred to that Committee; but I find that the Order of Reference bore date the 11th of August, 1848. I think, when I mention that date, the fact that the Bill did not pass through the other House will not surprise your Lordships. It would have been morally impossible that before the close of the Session it could have received the attention which, no doubt, it otherwise would have received. It reached the Committee; but the Committee did not feel warranted in recommending it to the adoption of the House. Passing from the general merits of the Bill, which I think are very great, I hope my noble Friend will allow me to make one or two suggestions as to matters of detail which have already to some extent been alluded to by some of your

Lordships. I think if my noble Friend will only consider the point, he will be of opinion that the first qualification he has imposed upon the resumption of proceedings in either House is altogether unnecessary—I mean that of obtaining the consent of the Crown. I quite concur with my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees that we ought to be careful in introducing, if not necessary and proper, the consent of the Crown as a condition preliminary to our legislation. If the Bill be one which requires the consent of the Crown to be signified—that is, if the Bill be one which touches the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown—then it is, of course, not only necessary that the consent of the Crown should be given in the first instance, but further I think in such a case the consent of the Crown given one year ought not to dispense with the necessity of obtaining it twelve months afterwards when Progress with the Bill is resumed; because it may well be that, in the interim, circumstances may have occurred which would induce the Advisers of the Crown not to recommend that such assent should be given to the measure. Therefore, my Lords, in that case it would be very fair to make the consent of the Crown a necessary condition. The other matter of detail to which I wish to refer is this—I quite agree with what fell from the noble Earl who spoke below the Gangway at the other side (Earl Russell) that we should be very careful, not merely for the sake of the House of Commons, but for our own sake, that if a Bill is to be resumed in a second Session, and is to be sent back to the House from which it was passed in the previous Session, that House, although it may not have the right to decide upon the principle of the Bill, which it has already accepted on the second reading, must have the right to amend it in detail, and not merely to deal with those Amendments which may have been made in the other House of Parliament; because it is not only possible, but it is extremely probable, that the lapse of a twelvemonth may have so altered the state of things with reference to the Bill that the House which had originated the measure may desire in many respects to alter it. As regards the progress of the present Bill, the noble Earl (Earl Granville) has recommended that it should be read a second time and then referred to a Joint solved in this way. If the noble Earl (Earl Granville), on communicating with his Colleagues, were in a position to say that the Government adopted entirely the principle of this Bill, but that they desired to have a Joint Committee of the two Houses, in order that the Joint Committee might say whether they would assent to the principle, and whether the principle should have effect given to it through the medium of a Bill or the medium of Standing Orders, and if the operations of the Joint Committee should be confined to that purpose, and that only, I think that would be a very good way of dealing with the further progress of the question. But if that is not the view of the noble Earl, then I should say, in reference to such a proposal, that it is very much better for my noble Friend to proceed in Committee of the Whole House with the Bill which he has brought forward.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I approve of the object of the Bill now before the House, because I believe that great advantage would result from the adoption of some system by which Bills might be resumed in a new Session of Parliament at the stage at which they arrived at the end of the previous Session. At the same time I must admit there is great force in the argument used by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) that it is objectionable to attempt, by means of legislation, to interfere with the course of proceeding in either House of Parliament. When this question was the subject of discussion on a former occasion, Lord Truro expressed a strong opinion against the adoption of any proposal to regulate the mode of procedure in either House by legislation. There is also much force in the objection of the noble and learned Lord to send this Bill to a Joint Committee of both Houses to be considered with a number of other subjects. I agree with my noble Friend (Earl Russell) that a Committee of this sort, if it is intended to devise some new arrangements to facilitate the transaction of business, is not likely to lead to any useful result. If it is to deal with recommendations to be suggested by Her Majesty's Government the case would of course be altogether altered; still I doubt whether the best way of dealing with such suggestions would be to refer them to a Joint Committee. I do not know how far the House of Commons would be willing to place the power of regulating their own mode of procedure in the hands of a Joint Committee. At the same time I am convinced that the present mode of procedure might be greatly improved, and stands in great need of being so, and if a Joint Committee be appointed to consider this question I hope they will not content themselves with recommending some such arrangement as that proposed by this Bill, but will look more deeply into the whole question, and consider whether in addition to this some more extensive improvement might not be made in the whole machinery of legislation. No one who has paid attention to the course of Public Business in either House during the last few years can fail to be sensible of the truth of what has been stated by the noble Marquess, that Parliament has become less and less able to deal satisfactorily with the vast mass of legislation which comes before it. There are a number of subjects of the highest importance which, for sheer want of time, fail to receive the consideration and despatch at the hands of Parliament to which they are entitled. There are notoriously many points in our law which require speedy improvement which are postponed from year to year and from Session to Session because there is not, under existing arrangements, time for their being properly attended to. In my opinion this press of business has become so great an evil that I am persuaded that in some mode or other, whether by means of a Joint Committee, such as is now proposed, or by some more deliberate method of inquiry, it is absolutely necessary to re-consider the whole machinery of our legislation; and I am convinced that a great deal may be done by the improvement of that machinery. The noble Lord has said very truly that much depends upon the manner in which Bills are prepared before they are brought before Parliament, and I do not think that our existing arrangements in that respect are at all satisfactory. But I must also submit to your Lordships that after Bills have been brought into Parliament our mode of dealing with them is most defective. They are read a second time and then they go before a Committee of the Whole House. Any one who knows what a difficult task it is to frame an Act of Parliament in such a manner that it shall clearly and accurately express the intentions of the Legislature, must see that if a Bill has been ever so carefully drawn up in the first instance, when the wording of the clauses comes to be discussed in a Committee of the Whole House, when Amendments are made in them, and new clauses are introduced, it is impossible that these can be properly considered by so numerous a body, with their bearing on the rest of the Bill and on the existing law. A Committee of the Whole House is not only utterly unfit to deal with the details of a Bill, but, in doing so, wastes much valuable time, and thus stops the work of necessary legislation. I am sure my noble Friend (Lord Russell) must, like myself, have a lively recollection of the many weary hours we sat on the Treasury Bench in the House of Commons in carrying through Committee some of the important measures proposed by Lord Melbourne's Government. In Bills which had been drawn up with the best professional assistance, it was common to hear Members proposing verbal Amendments, to which, at a moment's notice, and without an opportunity of deliberately considering their effect on other clauses of the Bill, it was difficult to perceive the objections, and thus Amendments which afterwards proved highly inconvenient were sometimes made with very little consideration. After we had been toiling from five until nine or ten o'clock in the evening, Gentlemen who had been much more agreeably engaged, and who were ignorant of what had occurred in the early part of the evening, used to come down to the House, take part in the discussion upon the Bills, and propose Amendments which were utterly inconsistent with what had been previously done. I even remember it to have happened that one of our own Colleagues had come down at a late hour and jumped up most gallantly to help us in defending some clause from an injudicious Amendment which had been pressed upon us, but unfortunately he did so upon grounds totally opposed to those upon which we ourselves had taken in his absence. From practical experience, therefore, I believe that a Committee of the Whole House is utterly incompetent to discharge the duties imposed upon it. The result of our present system of legislation is that, when a Bill has become law it is found to be so full of inconsistencies and blunders, and so difficult to understand that the time of our Judges and our courts of law is wasted in endeavouring to reconcile one inconsistent clause with another, and to put some rational meaning upon the awl we have made. It often happens, too, that while the early clauses in a Bill are discussed at unnecessary length, those in the latter part of a long Bill, which are not brought before the House until it is tired of the subject, are hurried through with scarcely any consideration whatever. In the early period of our Parliamentary history, I believe, the Houses of Parliament never attempted, as they now do, to deal with the technical task of putting an intended new law into words. At that time the substance of a measure was agreed to by the Houses of Parliament, but the manner in which that substance was to be worked out was left to be decided by the Judges. I do not desire to see these matters mixed up with the consideration of the present Bill, but I do hope that in some mode or other Parliament will consider whether it cannot improve its machinery of legislation. It is impossible our Acts of Parliament can be correctly drawn under the present system; but Parliament might depute to other persons what I may call the mechanical and technical task of settling the legal phraseology by which its objects are to be accomplished, without abandoning its proper control over the substance of legislation. Some such reform is urgently wanted to improve and expedite the process of legislation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: One or two of the points suggested by your Lordships in this discussion appear to me of considerable importance apart from the measure itself which has been proposed. I desire, however, to say a few words on two points only. I do hope that if a Joint Committee of the Members of both Houses be constituted in the manner which has been proposed, they will not fail to secure for the future the due framing of Bills which are to become the law of the land. It has been said by my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) that it is the business of the Government to see that the Bills which they bring forward are properly drawn and presented in a fit and proper manner. That, no doubt, is so; but my noble and learned Friend cannot forget that in the other House of Parliament there are many Members who, whatever the nature of the measure under consideration, think they can improve the wording of the Bill. Bills of magnitude, such as those dealing with the question of bankruptcy, the amendment of the mercantile law, or other measures which affect great classes of the country, are necessarily divided into a great number of clauses; and upon a Bill of perhaps 400 or 500 clauses, I will not say the interference, but the intervention of Members immediately occurs, who fancy that they can improve the wording of each particular section. The consequence is that when these Bills ultimately reach the Judges numberless provisions are so inconsistent with each other that it becomes a matter of great difficulty to give effect to the intentions of the Legislature, or frequently to discover what the intention really was. Now, if the Joint Committee, the constitution of which had been suggested, could be induced to recommend that the Houses of Parliament should concur in confiding to officers of their joint selection the task and duty of revising Bills with respect merely to their wording—but not as to other matters—before they received the Royal Assent, you will be taking one of the very best steps which has been taken for many years to promote an intelligible system of legislation. And, more than this, by appointing gentlemen of such ability as you ought to command, an easy means will be provided of digesting each Session the different Acts of Parliament which are passed, and of bringing their provisions into accord. Instead of having 160 new statutes passed every year, by applying to them some degree of method and classification, the mass of legislation presented to Parliament might be reduced by one-fourth or one-third of its present amount. After the discussion which the Bill has received I need not detain your Lordships with any general observations; but I must make one remark upon an observation which has fallen from the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees. He told your Lordships that there is no difficulty in passing a Bill through the Legislature rapidly and promptly, provided it be carefully prepared and properly worded; and he gave, as an illustration, the Lands Clauses,

The Lord Chancellor

the Railway Clauses, and the Companies Clauses Consolidation Acts. My Lords, I am unfortunately old enough to remember the very commencement of those clauses, from the time, I may say, when they were in their cradle. I am not going to inflict their history upon your Lordships; but I will shortly state that these clauses originally came from other Acts, being inserted in every Bill by the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who preceded the noble Lord in his Office of Chairman of Committees. They were called “Lord Shaftesbury’s Clauses,” and were inserted totidem verbis in every Bill, until it was found that, accidentally, differences had grown up in the copies of the clauses which were so inserted, and accordingly, to correct this error and with a view to future uniformity, it became necessary to embody these clauses in two or three general Acts. These clauses consequently had been nursed into existence for fourteen or fifteen years, and after that long minority they undoubtedly took a perfect shape under the care of the noble Chairman of Committees; and owing to the care and promptness which he exhibited, it was not likely that any clauses of a similar kind would experience much difficulty in passing into law. But the case is very different with any general measure of the character to which I have referred. The unfortunate Bankruptcy Bill has been introduced in the House of Commons by the Attorney General of one Government; in the next year it has again been introduced in the House of Commons by the Attorney General of another Government; in the following year it was introduced into this House by one of my noble and learned Friends (Lord Cairns). But I find that, whether introduced into the House of Commons or this House, that Bill has never had the good fortune to be passed into law, owing mainly, I believe, to the numerous clauses which it contains. If, however, we were to adopt the suggestion which has been made, and were to begin the discussion of the measure simultaneously in both Houses, many disagreeable consequences must follow—as, indeed, has been already pointed out. I apprehend that the wish of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Salisbury) is to economize and not to fill up time; but I can hardly conceive anything less likely to economize and utilize our time than our embarking on a discussion of the Bill simultaneously with the House of Commons. There are at least five points in the Bill each of such a character that any material change in one of these must necessitate a change throughout a great many clauses of the Bill. We might come to a conclusion in this House upon one of these leading points which would be opposed to that arrived at in the House of Commons, and the result would be that the labour of one or other of the Houses would be completely thrown away. I can imagine no greater waste of time than that your Lordships should be discussing the points of a Bill, on the assumption that they still remain in it, when perhaps the other House may have already struck them out. I trust that when this Joint Committee is appointed, it will not be thought unreasonable that one point at least to be brought under their consideration should be the propriety of having the wording of our Bills supervised before they ultimately pass through both Houses.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I have no reason to be otherwise than grateful to noble Lords who have taken part in the discussion for the manner in which they have dealt with and discussed the Bill. There are only two points upon which it will be necessary for me to say a few words. In the main I agree with the Amendments which have been suggested by my two noble Friends (the Earl of Derby and Lord Cairns). The precautions with respect to the Prerogative of the Crown and the assent of the other House of Parliament were introduced by me because I was told that jealousies would be created unless I did so. I, therefore, introduced those provisions, not because I liked them, but to disarm opposition to a Bill which I valued; and I shall be very glad to find that the principle of the Bill in its more simple form is likely to be adopted. I also agree with my noble Friend that it would be a very good arrangement, when the Bill goes back to the originating House, that power should exist to amend the Bill right through, and not merely those portions touched by the other House. With regard to a Joint Committee, the experience which we all possess of these inquiries must convince us that it is a dangerous thing to refer any measure you have a value for to a tribunal of the kind. There is such a tendency in Committees invariably to wander into all sorts of complex subjects, their efforts are so borne down by the excess of their own zeal, that before their inquiry has come to a conclusion, the facts which occasioned it are well-nigh lost sight of. That is my fear in the present case; but I am quite aware of the great importance of conciliating opinion and disarming objections in the other House of Parliament. If we could induce a certain number of the Members to meet us and dismiss the matter quietly there would be, I think, a great chance that we should induce them to take a favourable view of the principle of this Bill. I can only, therefore, trust — as we are all willing to do — to the good faith of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), that he makes this proposition for the purpose of getting the question settled, and not for the purpose of delay. With that understanding—which I am sure the noble Earl will not hesitate to enter into—I shall be glad to assent to the reference of the Bill to a Joint Committee. Upon the point of form, I do not know how far we are competent to refer the Bill to a Joint Committee, or to anything but a Committee of our own House, though we are at perfect liberty to suspend the Bill until a Joint Committee of both Houses has reported upon it. Probably that would be the most suitable course to adopt. Of course, if I saw that the deliberations of the Committee were being pursued to an extraordinary length, or that there was no sign of their coming to a conclusion, I should in that case seek to have the Bill recalled and proceeded with in the ordinary course. But, subject to that observation, I believe the course suggested is a very proper method of dealing with the subject.

EARL GRANVILLE: I hope there will be no misunderstanding as to the proposition I made. It is entirely for the noble Marquess to consider whether his proposal for a Joint Committee will be likely to facilitate the progress of the Bill or not. There will be no opposition to it from me in this House, but I have been informed by Lord Eversley, who has been obliged to leave the House, that the noble Marquess is under a misconception as to what occurred in the other House. The Bill was carefully considered by the Committee of the other House, but it was thought better to report simply against it in order to avoid any points of controversy between the two Houses. The Bill was, however, thoroughly discussed in the Committee upon its merits before that Report was agreed to. I suggested a Joint Committee to the noble Marquess, because there has already been a discussion on the despatch of Public Business in this House. It was admitted on both sides that there are evils to be corrected, and I think it would be advantageous if those evils were considered by persons of experience in both Houses. If this Bill were the only matter for consideration, I could hardly ask the House of Commons to propose so great a machinery as a Joint Committee to consider it. I can assure the noble Marquess that in making this proposal, and in serving on the Committee, if I should be appointed, I shall not have the slightest wish to lengthen its deliberations one minute longer than is necessary. I am grateful to my noble Friend (Lord Russell) for the advice he has given me, and if I go into the Committee I shall have some policy of my own as to what is to be done there. If, however, we are to have a Joint Committee, we ought not to lay down any cut-and-dried principles as to the course we shall pursue. That is the only means by which we can arrive at anything like a unanimous conclusion on the different points to be submitted to the Committee.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I think it most desirable to accept the proposal of the noble Earl opposite, and to refer the Bill to a Joint Committee of both Houses. Upon that Joint Committee persons of weight and influence in both Houses might serve, and facilities would be obtained for passing this measure. On the other hand, there might be danger to the Bill itself if all the various subjects mentioned by my noble Friend opposite—subjects so weighty, so considerable in extent and in numbers—were included in the Reference. The result might be that the Committee might defer reporting until the close of the Session. Supposing that both the Bill and the other important subjects were referred to the Joint Committee, an Instruction might be added that the Committee should, in the first instance, report on the Bill, and then the Joint Committee might determine the consideration of the other matters of the greatest importance. In this way it might be possible to find the means of reconciling the views of both sides of the House.

EARL GRANVILLE: If there is a Joint Committee there must be a general reference of all the subjects to it.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he would fix the Committee on the Bill for that day week, and he supposed the noble Earl opposite would arrange for the Joint Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he would communicate with the noble Marquess on the subject.

(NO. 14.) COMMITTEE. REPORT.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on the said Bill, read.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, that before he asked their Lordships to go into Committee on this Bill he wished to advert to something that had fallen from the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns) on the occasion of the second reading. It was absolutely necessary to recall the reasons why the former Bill had been passed, because it was framed and agreed to in order to stop the slave trade, and that trade had been stopped accordingly for ten or twelve years. Exception had been taken by the noble and learned Lord to the Bill, in ignorance, apparently, of the fact that it had been drawn by the Law Officers of the late Government last year. It was intended to be introduced by Lord Stanley, but it was first referred to the Law Officers of the late Government, and was approved by them in the exact form in which it now stood, with the exception of one verbal alteration made at the Foreign Office in the Preamble. He regretted the absence of another noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford), who was generally so regular in his Parliamentary attendance that he had not thought it necessary—as he otherwise should have done—to give him notice of his intention of referring to this matter. It would be in the recollection of their Lordships that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Chelmsford) stated he had not been consulted about the measure of 1845 before it passed, and that when it was proposed by Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons he had the greatest difficulty in finding arguments in its favour. It was not regular to read the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown, but he held in his hand an abstract of the opinion of the Law Officers of that day upon the Bill. That opinion was conclusive in favour of further legislative enactments such as were afterwards embodied in the Bill, and it bore the signatures of Sir John Dodson, Sir William Follett, and Sir Frederick Thesiger. He felt it his duty to draw the attention of their Lordships to this circumstance, not in order to convict the noble and learned Lord of inaccuracy, but because he feared that the effect of the noble and learned Lord's speech, backed as it had been by that of the noble and learned Lord the Leader of the Opposition, would be likely to produce a very injurious effect at Rio. He was, of course, far from attributing any such motive to the noble and learned Lord, but his speech might have the effect of encouraging the owners of Brazilian cruizers to suppose that they had claims against the English Government when no such claims could be recognized. If, however, there were any persons in Rio who looked forward to bringing any such claims before Parliament, on the authority of the noble and learned Lord, it would be well for them to know that the noble and learned Lord, when a Law Officer of the Crown, had signed an opinion directly opposite to that which he had expressed on Tuesday on the second reading of the Bill.

LORD CAIRNS said, he could not help thinking it would have been better if the noble Earl, intending to refer to what touched so directly the recollection of his noble and learned Friend on a matter which occurred so long ago as 1845, and regarding which there was a difference of opinion, had given notice, so that his noble and learned Friend might have been present to hear what was said and answer any charge that might be preferred. The noble Earl was about to take a course so unusual, and in his experience without precedent, of reading the opinion given by the Law Officers of the Crown upon the Aberdeen Act. The opinion given by the Law Officers of the Crown to their Governments had always been held to be sacred communications, never to be divulged to the public.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he had only intended to read the substance of the Opinion.

LORD CAIRNS must say the noble Earl took rather a peculiar view of what was private and confidential if he considered that he was entitled to communicate the substance of the opinion, provided only that the words of the opinion were not conveyed to the public. With one exception, where a protest was made that it should not be drawn into a precedent, the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown had always been considered sacred and not to be divulged. But what was of more importance, the noble Earl had not thought it right to inform his noble and learned Friend of the charge in respect to his memory which he perfectly well knew he was going to make. The noble Earl had said that he had criticized the Preamble of the Bill. What he had said was—as the right thing was going to be done, it might be invidious to criticize the manner of doing it; but he thought the Preamble should simply state that it was desirable to repeal the Aberdeen Act. He gave that as his opinion, and their Lordships would, of course, take it for what it was worth. The noble Earl said further that the late Government, of which he (Lord Cairns) was a member, had prepared a Bill on the subject, which had been settled by the Law Officers of the Crown; to which he could only reply that, while he was a Member of the Government no such Bill was even under consideration of the Government, and that he had never heard of it until he heard from the noble Earl opposite that he was about to introduce this Bill. He then told the noble Earl he (Lord Cairns) was glad that it was to be introduced. In 1864, in the House of Commons, he had expressed his opinion in regard to the Aberdeen Act in very unqualified terms—he said—

“As a question of international law it was impossible to look at that Act without feelings of unmitigated amazement. He firmly believed there was not a country in the world of whose strength we had reason to be afraid against whom we should ever have ventured to direct such a measure.”—[3 Hansard, clxxvi. 1642.]

ference to claims which might be raised—that effect might have been produced some years ago; but it was quite impossible that any such claims could be raised by any slaver. Whatever right of objection existed on the part of the Brazilian Government to the law as it existed, no right could exist on the part of any Brazilian subject to make any such claim. It would be absurd. He repeated his opinion that, although Brazil might have been charged with a violation of the treaty, and though we might have had a perfect right to send in reclamations against the way in which they were violating it, we had no right by legislation to authorize our subjects to seize when they found in Brazilian waters or even on the high seas, but more especially in Brazilian waters, Brazilian subjects engaged in the slave trade. No one could feel more strongly than he did the horrors of the trade which Brazil was at that time carrying on, and the great propriety of this country doing everything that could be done to stop that trade; but it was a very serious thing that we should make a precedent which might be used against ourselves by other countries, as we undoubtedly did when we conducted our legislation in violation of the principles of international law—and he feared that might be said of the Aberdeen Act. To that opinion he still adhered.

EARL RUSSELL said, he greatly regretted that he had not been present the other night when this subject was referred to, but he would not enter into the personal part of the subject. He would simply say that he quite approved of the principle of the measure which had been introduced for the repeal of the Aberdeen Act. There was one point of the utmost importance, and one which should be put on a proper footing, otherwise not only misconception but positive evil might arise. The subject was of the greatest importance, and it would be most unfortunate if it should go out to Brazil that the Parliament of England had made a great mistake and committed an injustice by the Act of 1845, and that this Bill was a reparation of that injustice. Against such an inference and such a statement he most strongly protested. His belief was that Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen were incapable of acting contrary to justice towards another country. He believed that the opinion given by the Law Officers of the Crown was the right opinion. The question of the slave trade, as already stated by his noble Friend, stood on grounds of high morality, which was the foundation of all international law, and in passing the Aberdeen Act Parliament did an act of justice and morality. No injustice was committed by the Act; it had answered all its purposes, and therefore in duty and wisdom it was now time to repeal it. What was really the efficient cause of the cessation of the slave trade in Brazil? The efficient cause was not any change in public opinion in Brazil, but the order which was given to the Admiralty, by the advice of Lord Palmerston, then at the head of the Foreign Office, that Her Majesty's ships of war and cruizers should go into the waters of Brazil and seize any Brazilian vessel engaged in the slave trade. There was no better title to the regard which the memory of Lord Palmerston was always sure to inspire than that which he derived from the acknowledgment that he always looked to the justice as well as to the technicalities of a case. The consequence was, as had been reported by Dr. Livingstone, that in Africa the name of Lord Palmerston was known and celebrated as the name of a man who had put an end to that inhuman and abominable traffic called the slave trade. He was very sorry that there should be any person whatever who should call in question the justice of the Act of 1845, and that the motive of passing a Bill for the purpose of repealing it should in any way be misunderstood. He had himself in the House of Commons opposed the repeal of that Act, and he should have opposed it now if the slave trade of Brazil were not abolished. It was the honour and glory of this country to have suppressed that horrid traffic called the slave trade, and he trusted it would soon be possible to withdraw the African squadron from the station where so much loss of life and hardship had been suffered in order to extinguish it.

House in Committee accordingly; Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^a To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

ARMY—THE WAR OFFICE AND HORSE GUARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If it be true that the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief is in the habit of making submissions for appointments in the Army to, and receiving the Commands from, Her Majesty the Queen directly, and not through the responsible Minister the Secretary of State for War?

MR. CARDWELL said, that as the Question fell, properly speaking, within his Department, he would answer it. The course pursued in the cases referred to by the hon. Member was this — Submissions are prepared in the office of the Field - Marshal Commanding-in-Chief; they are sent to the War Office for the approval of the Secretary of State, and having been approved by him they are submitted by the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief for the approval of Her Majesty, and he receives Her Majesty's commands upon them. His hon. Friend was probably aware that this subject was fully considered and reported upon by a very influential Committee of the House, presided over by Sir James Graham, and that Committee recommended that no alteration should be made in the custom.

THE MALT DUTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. M'COMBIE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government intend making any alteration in the Malt Duties this Session, or whether they are prepared to modify them in so far as they may bear injuriously on the agricultural interest?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope the hon. Gentleman will excuse me if I decline at this period of the Session to go into the question of the malt tax. It will not be very long before I shall have to make my Financial Statement to the House, and then I can argue the matter at length. Any answer which I might give at present would only do injustice to so large a subject.

GILBERT'S UNIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. MITFORD said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, If the Poor Law Board intend to exercise their powers with respect to the dissolution of Gilbert's Unions during the present year?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Poor Law Board to exercise its power as regarded the dissolution of the Gilbert Unions. In several cases the Board was already exercising its powers, and its inspector had just reported on the union in which the hon. Member was probably interested. The new system could not come into operation before the 25th of March.

CONVEYANCE OF FEVER PATIENTS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON-DAMER said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is the case that three or four patients recently brought to the Fever Hospital from different workhouses were found dead on arrival there, in consequence of having been conveyed in a sitting posture in cabs, instead of being conveyed in proper ambulances; and whether each parish should not be bound to provide a fever ambulance?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, it was unfortunately too true that the three or four patients referred to were found dead on their arrival at the Fever Hospital. Although it could not be said that their having been conveyed in a sitting posture caused the deaths, the medical officers stated that it may have materially contributed to the result, which was, of course, much to be deplored. With regard to the second part of the Question, he stated that parishes were not bound to provide ambulances, and that these patients were conveyed, not in ordinary cabs but in what are called parish cabs.

The matter was under the consideration of the Poor Law Board, and it was a question whether the Metropolitan Asylum Board should not take the matter in hand and provide proper carriages for the purpose. He added that the patients who had died were not carried a very long distance; it was the sitting posture and not the distance that caused their deaths.

EMIGRATION OF PAUPERS.

QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS LLOYD said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he is prepared to take into consideration the propriety of relaxing the rule now in force by which the Poor Law Board refuses its sanction to grants of money from Boards of Guardians in aid of paupers desirous of emigrating to the United States of America, and limits such sanction only to intending emigrants to our British Colonial possessions?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that the subject was under the consideration of the Board, and he had communicated with the Emigration Commissioners as to the regulations on pauper emigration. He found that one of the restrictions placed upon pauper emigration was that alluded by the hon. Baronet. It was at present illegal for guardians to send paupers to the United States, and the restrictions arose from a remonstrance made in 1838 by the United States Consul on the subject. Whether the United States had the same objection now to the immigration of paupers he could not say.

NAVY—OFFICE OF LORD HIGH ADMIRAL.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, after the recent declaration of the Secretary of State for War, that "it would be very unfortunate if the patronage connected with the Army were transferred from the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief to a political officer," it be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to revive the office of Lord High Admiral, and transfer to him the Naval patronage now vested in the First Lord of the Admiralty?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in reference to the answer given on a former evening by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, a certain part of which my hon. Friend has put in his Question, I beg to say that I entirely identify myself with the answer given by my right hon. Friend. Therefore, I am perfectly ready to reply to the challenge of my hon. Friend. Evidently my hon. Friend has framed a sort of proportion of four terms in his head. He thinks, that as the Secretary of State for War is to the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, so is the First Lord of the Admiralty to the Lord High Admiral. I apprehend, however, that that is not the fact. The Lord High Admiral is a great Officer of State, who, according to the ancient arrangements of the country, was charged, not only with the patronage, but with the whole of the administration of the Navy. The First Lord of the Admiralty is simply the first-named member of a Commission to whom is now intrusted the duties of the Lord High Admiral, precisely as the duties of the Lord High Treasurer are intrusted to the Commissioners of the Treasury. I think, therefore, my hon. Friend will have to re-consider this most ingeniously constructed Question. I do not, Sir, propose to revive the office of Lord High Admiral.

QUESTION.

MR. NORWOOD said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, If he will postpone the Second Reading of the Assessed Rates Bill, now fixed for the 4th March, to give time for the constituencies to express an opinion on its provisions?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that, in deference to numerous expressed views from various quarters, he would in the meantime postpone the second reading, but that he would set it down for an early day next week.

NAVY—THE COASTGUARD.

QUESTION.

MR. STEWART HARDY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the reductions contemplated in the Coast Guard ashore are to be general throughout the kingdom or confined to particular stations; and, if the latter, whether he would object to name the stations affected by them?

MR. CHILDERS, in reply, said, that the reduction shown in the Estimates for the year 1869-70 of the coastguardsmen on shore was from 4,850 men to 4,625, that was 225, of whom fifty were civilians and 175 were seamen. The reduction would be made over the whole service, but the places at which those 225 men would be reduced were altogether fifty-six, principally in rivers above custom houses, and 564 men were now employed at them. No reductions were being made in Ireland or the east coast of Scotland. It would be scarcely worth while to print detailed accounts of this description, but he would show the hon. Member the Papers if he would call at the Admiralty.

ARMY—EXAMINATIONS FOR COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT, remarking that the greatest anxiety prevailed among the parents of young men being prepared for examination, asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce the number of Cornets in Cavalry and Ensigns in Infantry Regiments, and to place them on half-pay; and, if so, whether the two usual Examinations of those wishing to obtain Commissions in the Army will take place this year?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, that the introduction of the squadron formation in lieu of the troop formation of the cavalry involved a reduction of four cornets in each of the cavalry regiments; there would also be a reduction of two companies in every infantry battalion returning from the colonies, and the result would be to diminish the number of officers in the two branches of the service. It was not intended, however, to place them upon half-pay, but to absorb them as vacancies occurred. The number of vacancies for candidates for new commissions would, of course, be diminished. It would, however, be necessary to have the first examination in May; but he was not able to say until the supernumeraries had been absorbed when the next examination would be held.

THE BLEACHWORKS ACTS—QUESTION.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Report of the Commissioner appointed to inquire into the operation of the Bleachworks and Printworks Acts, which was promised at the end of last Session, will be laid upon the Table; and, whether he intends to bring in any Bill on the subject during the present Session?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, that the Commissioner appointed to make the inquiry had unfortunately fallen ill immediately on the completion of his inquiry, and had been unwell ever since; he had recovered, however, and was now engaged in making his Report, which would, he hoped, be completed shortly; proposals for legislation would follow as soon as circumstances would permit.

CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been called to the amount of injury inflicted upon live stock from the want of any means of supplying them with food or water when in transit by rail, and to the consequent deterioration of the quality of meat supplied to the public; and, whether he will be prepared to make any regulations upon this subject in the Bill which he is about to introduce for the regulation of the Traffic in Cattle?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the subject was under the consideration of his noble Friend Lord De Grey and himself; the second part of the Question could be best answered later in the evening, when introducing the Bill having reference to cattle disease regulations.

ARMY—MILITIA QUARTERMASTERS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. PRICE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that Quartermasters of Militia regiments are entitled to no retiring allowance or pension after long service, except such as they may have been entitled to from service as non-commissioned officers or privates in the regular Army; and, whether he contemplates making any provision for the retirement of Quartermasters of the Militia of the United Kingdom, after certain length of service.

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that he was aware of their position, and the subject was at present under consideration, with a view to the point to which the hon. Gentleman had referred.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHITE said, that, according to the Notice on the Paper, they were about to go into Committee of Supply for a Supplementary Vote of £3,600,000 for the Abyssinian Expedition. Now, if no further sum was to be demanded, Her Majesty's Government owed it to themselves, to that House, and the country to recommend that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the cause of the huge discrepancy which had arisen between the original Estimates and the amount which had been, and would yet be, demanded; and more than that, the Committee should report as to who were responsible for such a monstrous miscalculation. He said "monstrous miscalculation," because, even if no further sum were to be demanded, the amount would be £3,600,000 more than the House was led to believe the expedition could possibly cost. To justify his remarks, although they had the Supplementary Estimate delivered only yesterday, he had taken the pains to revive his recollection of what had passed on the subject of this expedition, and he had communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury and also to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), who was Chancellor of the Exchequer in the late Government, his intention to draw the attention of the House to this enormous discrepancy. He found that on the 26th of November, 1867, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, used the following words with reference to the Abyssinian Expedition:—

"We believe it will be necessary that we should incur an expenditure of £3,500,000. . . . In case we have to replace the forces which the Indian Government now lend to Her Majesty, there will be an increase in the Estimate of

He might here state that we now knew that there had been no necessity to replace the forces which the Indian Government had lent to Her Majesty. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"I have seen the most absurd estimates on that head (the expenditure) in the public papers." Now, he (Mr. White) was responsible for the reports that had got into some of the papers with reference to the probable expense of the Abyssinian Expedition. He was then led to believe, and he did not hesitate to avow it, that on the scale on which the Indian Government had embarked, if the expedition were to continue to the end of May the expenditure would amount to £7,000,000, and that that estimate was under the mark was proved by the fact that the former expenditure together with the demand to be made that night, would reach the sum of £8,600,000. The right hon. Gentleman then went on to say—

"The whole amount that would be required would be £3,800,000, but the Government would contemplate the possibility of an expenditure, in round numbers, of £4,000,000."—[Ibid.]

Well, the House was aware that a Resolution was carried on the 29th of November, 1867, that the—

"Pay of European and Indian troops employed, as also the ordinary charges of any vessels belonging to the Government of India, were to be chargeable on the revenues of India."

And, therefore, any expenditure so incurred would be plus the amount paid by the Indian Government. He also found that in answer to an inquiry from the present Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Otway) the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), then Secretary for War, informed the House that a Treasury officer had been sent out to audit the general expenses. That was on the 2nd of December, 1867—the date was important—and a few days afterwards, when the same inquiry about expenditure was made, and it was alleged by the hon. Member for the King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien), on the authority of a distinguished officer who had served in Afghanistan, that if our stay in Abyssinia were protracted beyond April the expenditure would be more nearly £10,000,000 than £4,000,000, no notice was taken of the remark. Then he found on February 20, 1868, in answer to Questions from the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) and Mr. Darby Griffith, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"I have no reason whatever to believe that the general Estimate I put before the House has been exceeded."—[3 Hansard, cxc. 989.]

Then they came to the 16th of March, 1868, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Northamptonshire, in answer to Questions from the hon. Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) and the present First Lord of the Admiralty, said—

"My right hon. Friend the First Minister of the Crown stated in November last that it was estimated that if the expedition lasted, as was anticipated, to the end of April, the expenditure would amount to £3,500,000, and in certain eventualities it might extend to £4,000,000. . . . I believe, up to the time I am speaking, the expenditure in Abyssinia will be covered by the lower of these two amounts."—[Ibid. 1684.]

On the 3rd of April the House was favoured with an Estimate from the India Office. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) laid on the table an Estimate of the probable expenses of the expedition, and in reply to a question said that the Estimate had been prepared by a competent and trustworthy person. According to the Estimate which was laid on the table of the House, the charges in India and England were put at £5,000,000, and the following note was appended:—

"That sum is considerably in excess of the amount shown in Mr. Turner's Estimate to the end of April, 1868, after allowing for the additional month's expenditure; but it is stated by Mr. Turner (the officer of the Treasury sent out by the Home Government) that his Estimate has been framed on incomplete data, and that he has preferred to give totals which will doubtless prove to be considerably under the actuals, when brought to account, than otherwise."

He found, too, that Major General Jameson, auditor, signed the India Office Estimate and wrote, on the 12th of March, 1868—

"Providing the expedition terminates on the 31st of May, it would not be safe to ask for less than £3,000,000" (£2,000,000 having been already voted, thus making up £5,000,000 in all) "and there are charges which cannot at present be estimated, such, for instance, as the railways, telegraphs, &c. If continued beyond the 31st of May next, it would be safe to estimate a further charge of £600,000 for every month beyond that date."

On the 23rd of April, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Financial Statement, said—

"We estimate the total expenditure for the Abyssinian Expedition, supposing it is successful, and supposing, as we have reason to hope, that it leaves the country by the end of May, at £5,000,000."—[3 Hansard, cxc. 1165.]

When he reminded the House that on the 13th of April Magdala was taken, and on the 17th of the same month the troops were making preparations to return, he thought he had reason to inquire why there should be such an enormous discrepancy between the original Estimate and the actual disbursement? He had placed the facts before the House, and he would leave them to speak for themselves. He held it to be a disgrace to our country that an official Estimate should be not merely erroneous, but absolutely deceptive, and that such gross mis-statements should have been made by persons who were alleged to be quite competent to give correct information to the House. It was not for him to say who was to blame, or on whom the discredit was to fall, whether on the Treasury, the War Office, or the Indian Department. It would, he thought, be expedient to inquire into that matter, and affix the blame on those to whom it justly belonged; for it would detract very much from the administrative prestige of this country when it could be said that, merely to accomplish the object they had in view in sending out the Abyssinian Expedition Great Britain had spent more money than Prussia did in conquering one of the greatest European Powers—Austria.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. White) had said that he should wish an inquiry to be made with a view to settle the responsibility of the expenses of the Abyssinian Expedition, and he (Sir George Jenkinson) would suggest that the inquiry should be extended into the causes that led to the commencement of the Abyssinian War, and the mismanagement, if any should be proved, of those who caused the war. In the interest of England, they ought not to attempt to discredit an expedition begun in ignorance of the difficulties with which it might have to contend, and brought, in the eyes of all men, whether at home or abroad, whose opinion was worth anything, to the most auspicious termination. The Government who decided on that expedition did so, he believed, with the greatest possible forethought, and the General, under whose command it was placed, conducted it to so successful an issue, almost without any loss of life on their side, that he thought they ought to congratulate themselves on its exceedingly happy result, and, without cavilling at what they had to pay for it, only be thankful that they had not to pay any more.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am not quite sure that the moment at which the hon. Member for Brighton has raised this question is the most convenient one for its discussion. Certainly, I feel myself under a disadvantage, because we have not yet heard, what I suppose we shall hear as soon as we are in Committee, what the account or explanation is of the further sum for which the Government have to ask; and I have no doubt they will be able to state to the House that which we are unable to supply—what are the circumstances which, so far as they are informed of them, have led to this extra expenditure. If we were informed of the nature of the extra expenditure, we should be in a better position to offer, or attempt to offer, some explanation regarding it. However, there is no doubt that the hon. Member for Brighton is perfectly right in calling the attention of the House, at whatever moment he may think most expedient, to the great difference between the Estimate originally formed of the expense of this expedition, and the actual out-turn of which we are unfortunately aware. It is perfectly true that at the beginning, in November, 1867, the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, speaking then as Chancellor of the Exchequer, told the House that what was required was an immediate Vote of £2,000,000, and that, probably, if the expedition lasted till about the end of April, a sum of £1,500,000 or £2,000,000 more would be requisite. Now, what was the state of our information at the moment when my right hon. Friend was addressing the House? At that moment, the expedition had not, I think, actually left the shores of India; at all events, we had received no information of its having done so, and it had not yet reached the coast of the Red Sea. A very small pioneer expedition had gone out for the purpose of inquiries, and it was then impossible to estimate with any accuracy what the demands of the enterprize or the nature of the country would be beyond the coast from which the troops would have to advance. I believe that the Estimate of £2,000,000, formed with the idea that it would be sufficient to place the force on the coast, was a fair estimate; and, so far as I know, it has not been exceeded. With regard to the remaining portion of the Estimate, it certainly was of a very vague and loose character, based on a general reckoning of the cost of men in the field, assuming that supplies were easily to be obtained, and the country, or the greater part of it, tolerably accessible to troops. What I wish to call the attention of the House to is this—we must not take so much notice of casual Questions asked and answered as best they might be in a casual manner.—What the House has a right jealously to look at is the information that was supplied to it when it was called upon to vote money. Was the House truly informed by the Government of the state of the circumstances in which that request was made, and was it put in possession by the Government of all the information which they then had? That is the first question. Was anything kept back from the House? because, if anything was deliberately kept back, of course a serious charge might be made against the Government. As to whether the Government ought to have had better information, that is a question which we will enter into presently. But as to keeping back information, my right hon. Friend told the House all he had to tell it, on November 26, 1867, when he said that £2,000,000 would suffice to place the force on the shores of the Red Sea, and that perhaps £2,000,000 more would be needed. All I can say is that in naming that sum he exceeded what the authorities of the India Office, framing the best conjecture they could, led him to expect; and he observed to me afterwards that he had thought it right to put it at a rather higher sum, in order that it might cover all the possible expenditure. When the force landed the state of things was different from that on which we could have calculated. The country through which it had to march was one of the most impracticable and extraordinary that could be conceived. Not only that, but it was barren of supplies naturally, and it so happened that in that particular season it was barren in an exceptional degree, owing to the failure of the crops. It also turned out that the supply of water was less than we had any reason to suppose, and the water required for the force had to be got by the necessarily expensive means of condensing engines. That all added to the cost. The great object of the Government in sending out the expedition was this—knowing that we had a great task in hand—knowing that the honour and credit of the country were deeply involved in it—knowing that when we placed the troops there it was our duty to take every precaution for their well-being, we determined to spare no expense in carrying through the expedition at the smallest cost of human life and suffering, and with the utmost possible despatch. We were pressed for time—the difficulties were considerably greater than had been anticipated; but I believe no unnecessary expenditure was incurred or step taken in attaining our great object. At all events, we have the great satisfaction of knowing that the expedition was carried through in a perfectly successful manner, with the smallest possible sacrifice of human life or suffering. No doubt we discovered after a time that the expenditure was running up and was far more than we had been able to calculate; but there was a difficulty in getting correct information as to what the real rate of that expenditure was. And when my right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Hunt) came forward to ask what was necessary for the Supply of the year, the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) asked me whether we were prepared to state that we could give an Estimate which might be relied upon. I will call the attention of the House to the words in which I answered that Question before the Budget statement was made, in April, 1868. My answer was this—

“The accounts received from Bombay are, I regret to say, neither so full nor so accurate as I could have wished. They have, however, been placed in the hands of a gentleman of great experience in connection with military expeditions, and he has been engaged in making an Estimate which may be relied upon as much as any Estimate of the kind can be.”—[3 Hansard, cxi. 1148.]

It was also stated in the printed Paper laid on the table at the time to which the hon. Gentleman referred that—

“The information available here for the preparation of an Estimate of the expenditure on account of this expedition is very insufficient, although repeated applications have been made to the Government of Bombay on the subject. An Estimate has, however, been prepared in this office, which must be regarded as approximate only, from which it appears that the charges in India and England to the end of May, 1868, will probably amount to about £5,000,000.”

From that statement, and the answer which I gave, I think the hon. Gentleman must have been fully cognizant that we were not able to give an Estimate with any degree of accuracy, and that considering the extraordinary circumstances of the expedition and the very imperfect information which we could get, or which the Bombay Government at the time could collect, it was really impossible for us to give any Estimate that could be absolutely relied upon as to the total expenditure. Nor did we attempt to do so. We stated to the House that the expenditure might be taken at the rate of about £600,000 per month, and we gave the details of that £600,000. I shall be glad to hear whether those details were in any degree inaccurate, or whether the excess of expenditure was not greatly attributable to circumstances which arose after the period up to which our calculation was made. The length of time occupied in carrying the troops back to India, the expense of transports, and other circumstances, I have reason to believe, much exceeded anything that we had a right to calculate for. In saying this, I am not objecting to inquiry. It may throw light on the costs of a war, and in regard to the cost of wars I think we cannot have too much information for the guidance and warning of the House before we allow ourselves to be placed in a position in which wars become necessary. I hold it to be very desirable that we should have the fullest information as to the nature of the expenditure and all its details; but I entirely repudiate on the part of my Colleagues and myself the charge of placing Estimates before the House which were in any degree consciously inaccurate, or for which we ought in any degree to be blamed. We asked for no money after the date of the 23rd of April, though, of course, soon afterwards we saw that more money would be required. We could not get information enough to enable us to come down to the House with a full and complete statement, and we thought it better to wait till we could do so. The hon. Member for Brighton has taken up a position which it is quite right a Member of this House should take, and charge with the appearance of laches or faults the Government who had presented Estimates which happened to be greatly exceeded; but I hope he does not impute to us any want of good faith in presenting those Estimates. [Mr. WHITE: No!] When we have heard the explanation of the Government as to the excess of the Estimate we shall be in a better position to offer our opinions on the subject than we are at present. I trust the House will bear in mind that the Expedition was undertaken under very special circumstances. There was very little time that could be spared, for if we had run over another month or so we should have lost a whole season, in which event the expenses would have been enormously augmented. Besides, we were obliged to take precautions against contingencies, which, as it turned out in the result, did not occur. For instance, although we believed that the expedition would terminate before the end of the season, it was possible that it might not, and then the troops would have been left there in a state of great embarrassment, as everything they required had to be sent from a considerable distance. We, therefore, accumulated stores, which would have carried the army over another season if they had been detained there; and no doubt that accumulations of stores and their transport constituted one great cause of additional expense. In various other ways extra precautions were taken which swelled the expense beyond what might, strictly speaking, have been fixed as the limit. I hope we shall now go into Committee and hear any explanation which the Government may be able to give us. When I was at the India Office we were continually urging the Government of Bombay to send us full information, but as they had to obtain information from Calcutta, and from the officers sent to Syria and other parts of the coast of the Mediterranean and elsewhere, it was extremely difficult for them, with the great pressure on their resources necessary for the organization of the expedition, to comply with our demands for Returns and information. Before sitting down I must express my opinion that the Government of Bombay deserve great credit for the manner in which they organized the expedition, and that in particular Sir Seymour Fitzgerald is entitled to greater credit than he has obtained for his great exertions and personal labour.

HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE.—THE UNIVERSITY BOAT RACE. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT BURY wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Question of which he had given him private Notice. He did not know whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman had been directed to a letter which appeared in The Times a few days ago signed by Mr. Lambton Young, the secretary of the Royal Humane Society. The members of that society had reason to entertain grave apprehensions that the state of Hammersmith Bridge was such as might lead to a fearful accident on the occasion of the forthcoming boat race between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. It might not, perhaps, be generally known that the bridge was built fifty-two years ago, and was intended to be a specimen of lightness and elegance. The Humane Society had reason to believe that the chains of that bridge were not of such a form or description as would guarantee stability and strength, and that, moreover, the iron employed in the construction of the chains had become granulated. Now, hon. Members were aware that any sudden strain on iron was very apt to cause it to snap, whereas it would bear the same weight if spread over it uniformly with perfect security. Everyone who had witnessed the Oxford and Cambridge boat race knew that great numbers of people assembled on Hammersmith Bridge, and when the boats passed under it they swayed from side to side and made the bridge oscillate in a manner frightful to behold. Before the ensuing race, which was fixed for the 17th inst., he thought the Government ought to take some steps in order to ascertain whether the bridge was safe or not. He would therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he had any objection to send an engineer officer or civil engineer to examine and report upon the condition of the bridge; and if it were found to be insecure, whether the right hon. Gentleman would take steps to replace the iron rods by others which were perfectly safe. If, however, this were impracticable, he would suggest that policemen should be stationed at the bridge to prevent a very large crowd from going upon it on the day of the race. If immediate action were taken, it was possible that new rods might be placed so as to strengthen the structure and remove cause for apprehension?

MR. BRUCE: I think my noble Friend is quite justified in bringing this matter forward, in order that precautions may be taken to prevent what would be a great public calamity. I will undertake to communicate immediately with the Board of Trade, who, I believe, have at their disposal an engineer who is competent to make an inquiry; and such inquiry shall be immediately made.

VISCOUNT BURY hoped the result would be made public.

MR. BRUCE: It will be made public as soon as the report is received.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY VOTE.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Dodson, I have delayed as long as possible bringing this matter before the Committee because I hoped to be able to accompany it with a more satisfactory explanation than, unhappily, I am at present in a position to make; but as it is necessary that the business should be gone through before Easter, I hope the Committee will accept that circumstance as an excuse for my coming before them so imperfectly prepared to answer the questions which may be reasonably asked of me with regard to the details of this expenditure. I have received no further official information from the Indian Government since the telegram of the 17th of December, and the information—such as it is—that I possess, is compiled from very rough accounts sent home to us by Mr. Turner—the gentleman who was sent out from this country to superintend the expenditure in India. It is necessary, however, that the Indian Government should be re-imbursed some portion, at any rate, of the expenditure without any further delay; and that is my excuse for coming to the House more imperfectly provided with information than is desirable. The payments actually made for the expedition to Abyssinia—and in stating this I stand on a sure ground—are as follows:—The War Office has expended £461,000; the Admiralty has expended £1,262,000; the Government of India (according to Mr. Turner's estimate) has expended £7,040,000; and the total expenditure, therefore, adding these sums together, amounts to £8,763,000. Having stated the payments which we have some knowledge of, though I cannot undertake to state that the sum said to have been paid in India is the whole payment—I have no doubt it will amount to as much as that, but I cannot say whether it will not be more—the Committee will, I think, like to have a rough Estimate of the heads of expenditure under which this money will be brought to charge. This Estimate is taken from very rough accounts furnished to us by Mr. Turner from Bombay, and can only be taken as a general approximation. Now, this is what has been furnished to me, and it is the only information I am able to give with a view of satisfying the very reasonable curiosity of the Committee. Staff pay and batta (which does not mean the pay of the soldiers, but the extra pay they received while on foreign soil), £319,000; stores and supplies, £563,000; mules, camels, and forage (not including sea transport), £1,400,000; land transport—namely, the transport in Abyssinia and the railway and transport to and from Magdala, £1,345,000; sea transport, £4,232,000; coals, £581,000; miscellaneous, £160,000; making a total of £8,600,000. That is the amount, as far as we can ascertain, of the expenditure for the Abyssinian Expedition. Of this sum £5,000,000 has been provided for by a tax of 1*d.* on income in the year 1867-8, and by an addition of 2*d.* to the income-tax in 1868-9. It is necessary, therefore, that we should provide a further sum of £3,606,000. My duty is to ask the House to-night to grant the means of paying that sum; but how that sum is to be met is a question which, if I may be permitted to do so, I would rather reserve till I make my Financial Statement. All I ask at present is that we may be enabled to pay the money, which is, of course, greatly needed by the Indian Government, which had made such heavy disbursements on our account. The army and navy expenses we know exactly. They amount altogether to £1,723,000. The rest we know only approximately; but it is not likely to fall short of the sum which I have mentioned. I only hope it will not much exceed it. It is not my business, in making this Motion, to do more than merely state the facts of the case as far as I know them. There will be a deduction from this sum on account of certain savings in the War Department of £157,000, which will reduce the amount to be provided for to £3,606,000, and the Resolution I have to submit to the Committee is one authorizing that expenditure. I have, I think, nothing to add beyond the remark that these accounts are in some respects more meagre than I could have wished, while they are in other respects more full than I anticipated. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,600,000, be granted to Her Majesty, towards defraying the Expenses of the Expedition to Abyssinia, beyond the ordinary Grants of Parliament for Army and Navy Services."

MR. HUNT said, that the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) had alluded pointedly to a statement that he (Mr. Hunt) had made to the House in his official capacity, and, therefore, he felt called on to say a few words on the subject. His right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) had fully explained to the House that the Government of the day had placed before the House all the information that they possessed; and for himself he could only say that he had never kept back anything from the House, but gave it all the information he possessed. His right hon. Friend had explained the great difficulty which there was in obtaining reliable Estimates of the expenditure. It was obvious that as the expedition had to be fitted out almost entirely in Bombay, it could not be estimated for in the same way as one sent out from this country. He had also explained the shortness of time that there was for furnishing the expedition caused great difficulty in communicating between this country and India. Last year when they laid the Estimates on the table they asked for

£3,000,000, they acted on the best information they could then obtain, and the statement that they could not then obtain better information was fully borne out by what had just been stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who told them that he is even now able to furnish but a mere skeleton account of the expenses incurred. So far from being informed when they proposed the Estimate for £3,000,000 that it would be insufficient, he was, he believed, correct in saying that it was not until the 10th of August that the late Government received any information of an official character from India that led them to suppose that the Estimate would be exceeded. After Parliament had adjourned they were informed by Mr. Turner that, according to the best calculations he could make, the expenditure in India would be £5,350,000; and on the 9th of November last the India Office informed the Treasury that, according to their calculation, the expenditure would amount to £5,134,000; so that the best information in November fell very far short of the figures which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had just stated. There was a still more remarkable thing. He found from documents, for access to which he was indebted to the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman, that so late as the 8th of December last—that was after the late Government had resigned Office, but before the new Government had been formed—a telegram was received from India stating that the expenditure to that time was estimated at £5,750,000; and nine days later there was another telegram which stated that the expenditure in India would be £7,000,000. Indeed, down to a very late period their information did not show that the expenditure would be anything like the amount now stated. These facts would entirely exonerate the late Government from the suspicion of having kept back facts which ought to have been stated to the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that all the information which he could lay before the House had been furnished by Mr. Turner, a gentleman who had been sent out by the late Government to examine the accounts in India. It was only justice to that gentleman to say, that by the great energy and ability he had displayed, the confidence of the late Government in him was fully justified, and he felt sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could fully rely upon that gentleman's figures. It was no doubt an appalling sum that they were now called on to vote, and the excess had come upon himself and his Colleagues by surprise. But there was this consolation, that though like Englishmen they had to grumble and pay, this expedition had been a great success; the philanthropic object in view had been fully attained with the sacrifice of hardly any lives on our part. He hoped that this expenditure, vast as it was, would be the means of saving expenditure in future; for the result of the expedition was to show that the arm of this country was long enough to reach the most remote land where English subjects had suffered grievances which required redress. He hoped that this expenditure would prevent great expenditure in little wars, such as in times past they had had in their Eastern dominions; and that, therefore, the money would not have been thrown away. Should such be the result, they might congratulate themselves that the expedition had been undertaken.

MR. WHITE acquitted the late Government of any intention to deceive the House of Commons. What he complained of was that the Imperial Government should have been so deplorably ill-informed. That was disgraceful to our system of administration. The recklessness, waste, and confusion were almost incredible. Let one instance suffice—They had officers competing with one another in the purchase of mules, and some were sent to places where those artificial productions were not even known. He should be glad to have a Committee to inquire into the whole outlay if the Government thought it expedient. ["Move!"] If, hereafter, he were supported he would move. Even the present Vote did not, he believed, include the whole cost, which would probably prove to be at least £10,000,000.

MR. DENT expressed his astonishment at the meagreness of the information which had been laid before the Committee on the subject. Telegraphic messages had been received from Mr. Turner, but they appeared to be accompanied by no details. He should like to know who had had the power of spending the money.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN regretted that the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr.

White) had not taken a more practical course by moving for a Committee of Inquiry. When, on a former occasion, he had estimated the cost of the expedition as likely to be £10,000,000, his statement had been received with derision. The fact was there had been great mismanagement in many respects in connection with its organization. Officers had, for instance, been sent out to Barcelona to buy mules who knew nothing of Spanish, while others had been despatched on a similar errand to the Levant who could not speak a word of Italian. To show the anxiety of the House to prevent similar mismanagement, at least for the future, he thought that all the circumstances connected with this large expenditure should undergo inquiry. As an Amendment to the Vote, he begged to move — and he believed that the late Government would for their own honour support him—that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into this expenditure.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Amendment was not one which could be moved in Committee of Supply.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any sums would be received in aid of this expenditure by the sale of stores and material which were landed on the coast of Abyssinia in the expectation that the troops might be detained in the country during the summer?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the whole expenditure amounted to £8,763,000. The sum of £157,000 has been received on account of army savings in reduction of the gross amount, which is thus reduced to £8,606,000; and, leaving out the £6,000, we ask for £3,600,000, £5,000,000 having been already paid. I have no information whatever as to the sale of old stores.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN, in consequence of the intimation from the Chairman, would substitute for his Amendment another — that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

MR. HUNT said, he understood that the examined accounts sent home by Mr. Turner, who had proceeded to Bombay for the purpose, amounted to £4,300,000 of which sum the Indian Government had paid £4,000,000, and that it was not likely that any further accounts would be received until next May. He wished to know whether the Government had any further information?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied that the examined accounts, as far as they went at present, amounted to £5,700,000. He could not say exactly when they might expect the remainder.

MR. GLADSTONE: With respect to the Motion for reporting Progress I wish to point out to my hon. Friend (Sir Patrick O'Brien) that I think he can hardly advance by means of that Motion the purpose he has in view. I cannot wonder at the great interest which is shown in this subject; but I do not think my hon. Friend has precisely considered the force of the argument used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for granting this Vote to-night. The question is not one of incurring expenditure with our eyes open. It is a question of paying a debt which we have already incurred. Whether or not the Government of Bombay deserve all the credit given to them by the Gentlemen opposite I am not prepared at this moment to say. I should like to be very much better informed before giving an opinion on that point. But there is no doubt whatever that this expenditure has been incurred in good faith on the part of the Indian Government, under ample authority from the Government of this country, and the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is that it is not right to keep the Indian Government out of its money for the advances so made. On the other hand, we are now closely approaching Easter. If the Motion for reporting Progress contemplates a considerable delay, we should only fall into the fresh irregularity of throwing this charge upon the expenditure of next year. If, on the contrary, the Motion contemplates a short delay only, we should approach the question in a week or a fortnight under quite as great disadvantages as at present, for we have not the smallest hope of receiving fresh information within any short period. I do not in the slightest degree venture to give any opinion upon the remaining question to which my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) have referred, respecting the necessity of examining into this question. That is a totally different matter; but the demand which is reluctantly, though necessarily, made to-night is a demand for money disbursed by those who were acting as our agents, and who are at present out of pocket in respect of these advances. Under these circumstances I hope my hon. Friend will not oppose the grant of this money to-night.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that, on the understanding that the Government would give the fullest information they could in reference to the items composing the Vote, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

So much of Queen's Speech at the opening of the Session as relates to Parliamentary and Municipal Elections read, as followeth:—

"I recommend that you should inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and should consider whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom."

MR. BRUCE, in rising to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the present mode of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, in order to provide further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom, said, the great extension of the franchise which was made during the last Session of Parliament gave universal satisfaction to the country, and the demand that was made to keep down corrupt practices by a more stringent mode of inquiring into them afforded public testimony to the desire of the House of Commons to grapple with a great evil. But the satisfaction of the country will not be complete unless at an early period Parliament gives evidence of its desire to rid our electoral system of evils the greatness of which has long been acknowledged. For years past Parliament has been struggling in a vain endeavour to give to our elections the dignity that should preside over ceremonies of such great importance, to rid ourselves of the taint—which may almost be called a national taint—of corruption in our elections, and above all things to secure to the voter freedom, independence, and the right of bestowing his vote according to his conscience. I will ask the House—I will ask both sides of the House with equal confidence—has the result of our legislation been to secure these objects? Is there, or is there not, reason for that strong and deep-seated dissatisfaction which universally exists upon this subject? From the other side of the House I anticipate the same answer as from this. Everywhere there will be an admission of the evil. The only difference will be as to the remedy which ought to be applied to that evil. The object of the Motion which I have now to make, in accordance with the recommendations in the Speech from the Throne, is that this House should appoint a Select Committee in order to inquire into the best methods of getting rid of these admitted evils. Now, what are these evils? One of the greatest, undoubtedly, is the enormous expenditure at these elections. And here I do not simply speak of that expenditure which has been branded as illegal. For my own part, I consider that the expenditure generally considered legal and legitimate is far more corrupting and far more demoralizing than that which is called by the name of bribery. Direct bribery is confined to comparatively a small number of men, and limited to some portions of the country, there being wide districts that are entirely free from it. It has hardly, if at all, reached Scotland; and we all know that it has not extended into Wales. It is not greatly practised at our county elections, and no inconsiderable number of English boroughs are entirely free from it. It was a kind of hereditary disease in certain localities. The offence of bribery—although in itself a considerable one—is not, so far as my knowledge goes, to be compared in its injurious effects upon our elections with the largeness of the expenditure incurred. A Return moved for last Session, which on the face of it is very imperfect, shows that the admitted expenditure at the General Election of 1865 was no less than £752,000; and I believe that £1,000,000 would be far from defraying the actual expenses. I have no means of comparing the total sum expended in 1865 with that which the election of 1868 cost; but I have some of the Returns for the last election. In North and South Shropshire, the elections cost no less than £20,412. In North Durham, the expenses of one candidate, an hon. Friend of my own, have been returned at £15,302; and, as I observe that in that useful compendium, Dod's Parliamentary Companion, my hon. Friend is in favour of a considerable reduction being made in the public expenditure, I am quite sure I shall have him with me in promoting an inquiry as to whether any measures can be devised for introducing economy into our elections. Other Returns of expenditure are as follows:—South Northamptonshire, £10,257; East Staffordshire, one candidate, £6,546; Bradford, one candidate, £7,000, but according to sworn testimony, the amount was £11,000; Westminster, £10,596; Manchester, £13,596; Sunderland, £8,383; Norwich, £7,000; and a comparatively small place like York, £5,952. The effect of all this expenditure is not only further to demoralize a class already lost to all sense of honesty in these matters, but to reach a far larger and more respectable class. It has further the effect of encouraging useless contests merely for the sake of profit to those who had better be nameless. It has the effect of introducing a practice which causes to the electors themselves the greatest annoyance and trouble—the employment of paid canvassers. Of all grievances this is perhaps felt to be the most intolerable by the elector. During what I may call the long agony which preceded the General Election of 1868, I often heard, and I am sure nearly every one engaged in a contested election must have heard, complaints from electors upon the subject, how, when they had announced how they were going to give their votes, they were still made the subjects of pressing solicitations; how they were visited by one side or the other every week or every fortnight, and how every sort of influence that could be supposed to affect their votes was brought to bear upon them; and all this was done, not through the voluntary zeal of persons anxious for the success of candidates, but in most cases by persons who wished to justify the payment made to them or to swell its amount. Another evil consequence of this excessive expenditure is that men of moderate means, although, perhaps, of great abilities, are kept out of Parliament, and we are in danger of being a Parliament of rich men. However much we may profess a desire to see all classes, and especially the working classes, represented in Parliament, we appear to deny it by permitting the enormous expenditure which even the cheapest election entails. If we are in earnest in acknowledging this evil, I hope we shall be equally in earnest in applying ourselves to devise a remedy. Although bribery is a limited and partial evil, the steps hitherto taken to diminish it have been singularly ineffectual. Act after Act has been passed imposing penalty after penalty, fines have been inflicted upon bribers and bribed. You have had disabilities and disqualifications affixed to the offence, and yet little progress has been made in stopping it. Perhaps under the terror of local inquiry the practice of bribery may have been discontinued for a time, but it has been resumed again, and the Returns show that there has been no practical diminution in the amount of election expenses. It may be said we have adopted the most effectual means we can to check it by localizing inquiry; but I think the House will admit, although local inquiry may occasionally have been efficacious, it has proved to be quite inadequate as a remedy. In the first place, what certainty is there, even where bribery has prevailed, that an inquiry will be instituted? There are many reasons why it may not. One is the great cost of an inquiry; and the deterrent effect of such cost does not appear to have been diminished by making the inquiry local. Not only do the expenses of inquiry appear to be very great, but the rule generally, though not uniformly followed, of making the expenses follow the event, even when there appeared to be bond fide reason for prosecuting the petition, will, I think, be a discouragement to those who wish to contest the validity of an election. Then, again, there is the fear that the case made out may be too good, and that the result will be the disfranchising of the constituency. There is no doubt that that fear has operated in more than one case. Another cause of inaction in these cases is the fear that success in unseating the sitting Member would not be followed by any gain to the petitioners or the parties they represent. All these causes have operated in preventing prosecutions for bribery when bribery was known to have existed. The same may be said of the sister crime of treating. It is an evil the greatness of which must be well known to all who have had any experience of elections. It demoralizes the lower classes, and it is difficult of proof. See what goes on at every election. Committees and sub-committees are formed, and meet at several public-houses in succession, and every encouragement is given to expenditure, the liability for which it is often found impossible to trace. It may be, perhaps, that the treating overflows from the preceding municipal election; but whatever may be the cause, there exists an evil which is a very wide-spread one, and which the great extension of the suffrage is likely to render still more dangerous. The greatest of the evils connected with elections, and one which most vitally affects the great body of the electors, is that of intimidation. I do not deny that there has been a great improvement within my recollection in this respect. Many persons, a few years ago, would have supposed they were only exercising an ordinary right in compelling tenants to vote on their side, or in using influence in the strongest manner over their workmen. I do not deny that all this has been greatly altered; but still that intimidation exists, and exists very widely, and that its influence was greatly felt at the last election no honest and truthful man will, I think, venture to deny, while in many counties, even where it had been perfectly well ascertained that the opinions of the electors were identical, you might put the letter "L" or the letter "C" against the names of the inhabitants of whole villages when you had ascertained whose property they were. Then comes the question as to what extent the employer influences the employed. Now, the amount of the real opposition of this kind is very great, but, no doubt the extent of it is much exaggerated in the minds of the voters themselves. Many a workman imagines intimidation that was never intended, but his fear is none the less real to himself. A great portion of the electors, too, are seriously desirous of doing their duty, but they feel they have duties as regards their families as well as themselves. They say they cannot, for the sake of discharging a political obligation, run the risk of ruining their families and themselves. The consequence is that a very estimable class of men, from want of self-sacrifice, perhaps, withdraw almost entirely from public life and endeavour to strangle in the bud all those manly feelings which would elevate them by cultivating their sense of public responsibility. Again, Sir, it is very easy for those who run no risk to laugh at the fears of tradesmen, but we know what has occurred even at the last election. There are many hon. Members who would be able to state of their own experience that the conscientious performance by a tradesman of his duty as an elector has been followed by the withdrawal of custom he could ill afford to lose. But this sort of interference with the conscience of an elector is, I am bound to say, not confined to the higher classes. I myself have seen pressure brought to bear upon small tradesmen by workpeople themselves, who visit a tradesman and inform him that their custom and the custom of their friends will in future depend upon his supporting a particular man. The evil, therefore, requires to be guarded against upon all sides, and the question for the House to consider is whether any remedy can be found for it. There is one other feature connected with our system of election which I think will be generally condemned; I refer to those scenes of rioting and violence which so frequently characterize a contested election. I know not how the House may regard the matter, but to me nothing is more humiliating than to witness the conduct of the large bodies of men who collect together on days of nomination. There is no inconsiderable number of the humblest of our countrymen who take an earnest and disinterested part in political affairs, and who are willing to make the greatest sacrifice to promote views which they believe to be to the interest of the country; but there is also a large number who look upon an election as an occasion for amusement and wild excitement, and these are the people who come to the front and who make their presence most sensibly felt on the day of nomination and on the day of the declaration of the poll. Well, are these ceremonies a necessary part of our electoral system? Is it necessary there should be a nomination day? Is it necessary there should be a declaration of the poll, at which the candidates must appear? Why, at every other election, and we have several besides Parliamentary Elections—at the municipal elections, at the election of Boards of Health and Boards of Guardians—personal nomination has ceased to be the rule; the nomination is by papers, and the declaration of the poll, instead of being made every hour or so, exciting the electors inordinately, is made, not by the returning officer personally, but by advertisement and placards. In one of our colonies, which has supplied itself with great vigour to the perfection of electoral machinery—Australia—the system of personal nomination does not exist; it has been replaced by that of nomination by papers, and the result is a state of tranquillity which, as compared with our own election scenes, I may describe as truly enviable. Well, Sir, the question we have to ask ourselves is, whether Parliament shall confess itself unable to remove these evils? Is the inquiry I ask for so obviously useless, and must it of necessity be so barren in result, that it ought to be refused? On behalf of the people, I am bound to say there is a deep-rooted conviction that there is an effectual remedy for this. Rightly or wrongly—and I am not going to say whether rightly or wrongly—a remarkable unanimity prevails, and has prevailed for many years, throughout the country among a vast majority of the people in favour of a system of secret voting. Over and over again I have heard the electors express their astonishment that, considering how deep and how general this conviction is, especially on the part of the electors who supported the Liberal candidates, it has not received the sanction of Parliament. Now, I can make that statement as free from any personal motive, perhaps, as any Member in this House. I have sat for the last sixteen years representing an eminently Liberal constituency, where, I believe, every nine out of ten of the electors were in favour of the ballot, and yet, during the sixteen years I have sat in Parliament, I have never voted for or against the ballot. I have not voted for the ballot because I felt the system of open voting had many advantages. I felt that the general moral effect of open voting was to encourage manliness and truth; that the general effect of secret voting was to encourage mystery, which in itself is often an evil. Secret voting, I have always felt, might lead to falsehood. I never doubted that the machinery of the ballot would secure a great improvement in the practices at our elections; it would secure tranquillity, would somewhat diminish bribery, and probably lead to the disappearance of intimidation altogether. On the other hand, my objection to the system aimed at its very root; but I confess that the scenes I witnessed during the last election have made me doubt very much whether, admitting to its fullest extent all that can be said against the system of secret voting, the arguments on the other side are not the weightier. Let me at once meet the chief objection to the ballot which has influenced the votes of most of those who have opposed it in this House; for the evil consequences of secrecy have weighed, not only with Gentlemen on the other side of the House, not only with the representatives of the old Whigs, but they have been powerfully urged by many gentlemen whom it would be no offence to describe as advanced Liberals. We know that Mr. Mill has written very powerfully against the ballot. We know that at least two Members whom I may venture to name as advanced Liberals—the Members for Frome and Perthshire, (Mr. Hughes and Mr. Parker)—oppose the system of secret voting as being in itself objectionable. But, admitting what they say, that in every State opinions should be openly expressed, and that public opinion is formed by open expression, and admitting that deceit and falsehood may be resorted to in order to conceal the vote after it has been given, we must look to the ultimate result, and see what would be the effect of the introduction of the system—whether, on the whole, it would be good or ill. This conviction has come to me very slowly, but I will undertake to say, that in less than five years after the introduction of the ballot, the practice of pressing a man for his vote, or even of asking him for it, would entirely disappear. It has been often said that if the ballot were introduced at all it should be optional, but it has been demonstrated over and over again, that optional secret voting is no protection at all to the voter. Electors have said to me, “Give me the power of voting as I please, secretly or openly.” I have always replied, “As long as it is in the power of a man who wishes to influence your vote to say, ‘You can vote openly if you please, and unless you do, I shall assume you are voting against me;’ and as long as it is in the power of a briber to say to the voter he wishes to bribe, ‘I cannot pay you unless you vote openly,’ the ballot will be useless. To be efficacious it must be compulsory. The vote must be given in secrecy, so as that no man shall know how another man votes.” And I say now that, under those circumstances, it will be perfectly idle for anybody to attempt to influence the vote of his neighbour by intimidation. The only effect would be to irritate the elector and secure his opposition, and, as I have already said, before five years were over, the system of personal solicitation and personal canvass would disappear; men would learn to swim without bladders; they would become accustomed to act independently, and would not be afraid to express their opinions openly, and that lofty view of Englishmen which is embodied in the line—

“Pride in their port, defiance in their eye”—instead of being limited to a small number, might be extended to the whole electoral community. If, therefore, to my own satisfaction, and I hope to the satisfaction of others, who, like myself, doubted for a long time as to the propriety of the ballot, I have answered the objection that it was no better than an instrument of deceit and fraud, I feel that the rest of my task will be plain sailing indeed. At elections in Australia personation, so common in America, is not known; and not only is personation unknown, but bribery also has been greatly reduced. Whatever remedy exists against bribery in this country exists equally there, and with superadded guarantees. As for intimidation—that evil which of all others is most felt by the electors of this country—it would, as I have said before, be simply preposterous under the system of the ballot. Now, if it can be demonstrated, as I am informed it can, before a Committee, that all these advantages would arise from secret voting; that the moral evils resulting from it would in a short time be greatly mollified, and at last probably disappear, I have to ask the House to appoint a Select Committee with the object—I avow it openly—of inquiring whether a system of secret voting cannot be devised which will bring security, freedom, and independence to the elector. Sir, I anticipate no opposition from either side of the House. I believe that hon. Gentlemen opposite who distinguished themselves during the late Sessions by their zeal for electoral reform and for extending the rights of voting to such large classes of their fellow-countrymen, who have themselves introduced a measure for giving greater stringency to inquiries into corrupt practices at elections—I believe that those hon. Gentlemen have as great an interest as we have in the honour and character of this House. Now, the honour and character of this House depend entirely upon the manner in which its Members are elected. It cannot be that men who are elected by the power of money or by intimidation can really be regarded by the people of this country as their true representatives. Among us, no doubt, are men who deservedly enjoy the popular favour, and are freely chosen by the popular franchise; but if it is proved to the satisfaction of candid men that persons are sent to this House, not from any merits of their own or by the free choice of the electors, but by individual influence or the lavish expenditure of money, how can the people give us that confidence which they would give if they really felt that we were the true representatives of the country? It is my anxious desire that we should be the country's true representatives, and that by the improved machinery of our elections we should give to this House a character that it has never yet fully possessed; that we should strengthen our Parliamentary institutions, and especially that great representative body upon whom the labour of legislation and the heaviest portion of the government of the people of this country mainly rests.

MR. ROBERT TORRENS said, he rejoiced that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce), in his Motion, had coupled municipal with Parliamentary elections, because it was during the former that the corrupt practices of which they all complained were mainly developed and fostered. The machinery of bribery was organized at the municipal elections. He did not wish to detract from the merits of the measure which had been carried through the House last year by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). He (Mr. Torrens) considered that that measure was a great improvement in their electoral machinery, and a great step towards the suppression of corrupt practices; still there were many circumstances which were not, and could not, be considered when that measure was before them. By the light which had been thrown upon it by recent inquiries, and by the Reports of the Judges, it was clear that the measure was very defective, and had failed in its great object—that of being deterrent. Petitioners ceased to prosecute further inquiries when once they had succeeded in unseating their opponents; in fact, it was not their interest to do so. A great want had been felt in the absence of a public prosecutor, whose duty it would be to take means for punishing all those who, by corrupt practices, offended against the law. The Act, therefore, required considerable amendment in this respect. In transferring the jurisdiction from Committees of that House to the Judges, a great advantage, no doubt, had been gained, because bribery and corruption were at once stamped as a disgraceful offence, which had not been the case before. As he had just emerged from a petition against his return, he was anxious to state the impressions it had made on his mind. These were, first, that the investigation should be made not only into alleged corrupt practices of the winning side, but into the other side also; and, secondly, that it would be well if petitioners instead of merely signing a petition as at present, were compelled to substantiate the allegations on oath. Such an alteration would be a protection to those who, on frivolous pretences, might be subjected to a painful and invidious course of proceeding. He wished to bear his testimony to the successful working of the ballot in Australia. He, like the right hon. Gentleman, had been made a convert to that system. As a Member of the Legislature and Minister of the Government in Australia, he had used every effort in his power to prevent its adoption; but when he saw that system operated as a specific to the evils of which they had complained, and that it was not followed by any of the bad consequences which he had apprehended, he was driven by the force of facts to recant the opinions he had publicly expressed and to acknowledge that he had been mistaken. It was the arguments of the late Lord Palmerston and of Mr. Stuart Mill that had previously convinced, or he would say prejudiced, his mind against the ballot. When he found that the facts in working did not correspond with what they had predicted he began to inquire into their arguments. It was often urged against the ballot that the franchise could not be a right, otherwise a man would be entitled to sell his vote. But there was a fallacy in that argument, because the franchise itself might be a right without necessarily implying the right to sell it. It resembled in that respect many incorporeal rights and easements attaching to the possession of land, which did not carry a right to sell. Those who maintained that the franchise was a trust would do well to consider whether it was not better for the public weal and for the good of those for whose benefit that trust was said to be held that the trustee should be placed by the ballot in a position to exercise his privilege freely and according to the best of his judgment, than that he should be subjected, by the system of open voting, to the corrupt arts of the rich, the intimidation of the mob, or the undue influence of his landlord or employer. In the borough with which he was connected he had been made painfully aware of the degree of pressure which was often applied to some of the voters, and he had no hesitation in saying that the adoption of the ballot would be hailed in many parts of the country with as much satisfaction as the extension of the franchise itself had given; for it was vain to offer people a vote unless they were protected against coercion in its conscientious exercise.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, in answer to Her Majesty's gracious Speech the House expressed its readiness—

“To inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, and to consider whether it may be possible to provide any further guarantee for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom.”

To that pledge—given alike by this side of the House and by the other—we are perfectly prepared to adhere; but it must not be taken that we consent to this being made in any sense a one-sided inquiry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has avowed openly the change, or, at least, the maturing, of his convictions during the last sixteen years regarding the ballot, and those convictions have now attained a strength and a permanence which leave no doubt almost as to what effect any evidence which may be obtained on that subject hereafter will have on his mind. In the course, however, of his very able speech I was surprised that, coming as he does from a district which has been disturbed by another kind of intimidation than that to which he alluded, he omitted to notice that kind of intimidation. I refer to the intimidation practised by mobs—a matter which I trust this Committee will take into its serious consideration. That intimidation is exercised not merely at the hustings, but during the polling day. Grievous injury is inflicted on voters by infuriated mobs and property is destroyed for which the sufferer can obtain no redress or compensation because the perpetrators of these outrages cannot be ascertained in many instances, and also because their acts are said not to be felonious. In the county of Monmouth the houses of electors who had voted in a particular way had been picked out with the greatest precision, the furniture they contained destroyed, as I understand, and the houses much wrecked and damaged; but because those outrages are supposed not to have been feloniously committed, no compensation for them can be obtained from the Hundred. I hope, therefore, that care will be taken that the neighbourhoods in which riotous mobs act in that way will be made to suffer, even though their acts may not be felonious. The man who avows his opinions openly will always be exposed to the vengeance of the mob, and, therefore, whether you have secret voting or not, it will be necessary to protect those voters—who will, I believe, always be the vast majority in this country—who are not afraid to avow their opinions. I shall not now enter into the question of the ballot, but will only add that I hope the proposed Committee will be, as far as possible, an impartial one—that it will inquire in an impartial manner into these subjects; and that it will not prove a mere cloak for men who have already changed their minds.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, that I am quite safe if I say that I regard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last as a very fair acceptance of the proposal of my right hon. Friend. When we come to discuss a general Motion of this kind, which involves every part of the procedure connected with the conduct of an election from beginning to end, it is by no means unnatural that the interest of the House and whatever discussion arises should centre round the ballot, because the ballot has been for more years than many persons recollect a subject of the liveliest interest in connexion with the procedure at elections. But undoubtedly it would be a mistake to suppose that the inquiries of this Committee are intended, so far as we are concerned, to be confined to the matter of secret voting, or that the Government, as a Government, proposes this Committee with any view to a foregone conclusion. The purpose of the Committee is this—My right hon. Friend, in the fairest and most ingenuous manner, stated the change that has taken place in his own mind. So far as the ballot goes, I think that in every Liberal Government which I can recollect—I know not whether it has been the same in Conservative Governments or not—but in every Liberal Government which I can recollect, the ballot has been an open question; and my right hon. Friend has very frankly avowed the change which his own mind has undergone on the subject—a change which has, perhaps, reached, or nearly reached, maturity. So far as the collective view of the Government is concerned, it can hardly be said—and I speak under correction—to go beyond this—It is quite evident that the very large extension of the franchise which has taken place has altered—in some cases, perhaps, slightly, in many very greatly and even fundamentally—a number of the conditions under which elections are carried on. This, then, appears to us a fair occasion for examining into the whole subject; and, undoubtedly, as respects the exercise of the suffrage with freedom, that has become a matter, if possible, more vital than at any former time, in proportion to the larger number of persons interested in it. Here, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy) says, “I hope the Committee will be allowed to inquire into the intimidation by mobs,” Most cordially do I hope so, too; for no doubt intimidation must form one main chapter of this inquiry. The Committee, I hope will endeavour to gain evidence on all these questions—on questions that bear on intimidation by violence, questions that bear on intimidation in other forms than by violence, questions that bear on treating and drunkenness, questions that bear on excessive expenditure, and questions that bear on bribery; these being the chief evils connected with elections. But we must remember that intimidation has a double form; it may come either from above or from beneath. Possibly the more stealthy and subtle form of it comes from above; but it is equally our duty to detect and take effectual securities—if we can—to prevent the intimidation that comes from beneath. As I apprehend, the purpose and formation of the Committee will have to be carefully watched, but its main function will be to collect facts bearing upon the various questions of procedure connected with elections; and undoubtedly, it will also be within its province to consider what are the most appropriate remedies with a view to the diminution or removal of the evils attendant on them. But I think we have no reason to complain of the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has met the proposal.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the existing state of the law was so defective in respect to riotous proceedings at elections that, even although such proceedings were anticipated, it was almost impossible for the authorities to take steps for providing the requisite protection against them, without incurring expense or loss in their individual capacity. In his opinion the Committee should inquire with respect to the appointment and expenses of special constables, and also as to the power to grant damages for the destruction of property. At present the machinery for that purpose was complex and costly.

MR. EYKYN said, he had heard with the greatest satisfaction the announcement which had been made from the Treasury Bench. He hoped that at the next General Election votes would be recorded by ballot. He was glad that the subject of municipal elections was to be inquired into, for he regarded those elections as a perfect school for corruption.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, it had been pointed out on the other side of the House that election expenses were very heavy in the United States where the system of vote by ballot was in force, This showed that the ballot would considerably increase the cost of elections, both as to bribery and other expenses. He trusted that in any future inquiry the questions of the conveyance of voters to the poll, the introduction of voting places, and the extension of polling papers to every parish, would be duly considered.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the present modes of conducting Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, in order to provide further guarantees for their tranquillity, purity, and freedom."—(Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

And, on March 16, Committee nominated as follows:—The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. HUNT, Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. VILLIERS, Sir FREDERICK HEYGATE, Mr. BRAND, Mr. CROSS, Mr. WHITBREAD, Mr. RAIKES, Mr. LEATHAM, Mr. STAVELEY HILL, Mr. LOCKE, Mr. HENRY SMITH, The O'CONOR DON, Mr. GRAVES, Mr. DALGLISH, Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Mr. JAMES, and Mr. HOWES:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Seven to be the quorum.

And, on March 19, Mr. FAWCETT, Mr. EDWARD EGERTON added.

BEWDLEY WRIT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Bewdley, in the room of Sir Richard Atwood Glass, whose Election has been determined to be void."—(Mr. Noel.)

MR. MUNTZ rose to move as an Amendment that the issuing of the Writ be suspended for twelve months. He could satisfactorily prove to the House that there were good reasons for taking such a step. Just before the Dissolution, the old House, in a fit of virtue, passed the Corrupt Practices Act, a very valuable measure, under the provisions of which there had been a trial at Bewdley. Mr. Justice Blackburn, who presided at the trial, stated that corrupt practices had prevailed extensively in the borough of Bewdley, and the result was that Sir Richard Glass, who had been returned as its representative in Parliament, was unseated. Now, if this had been the sole instance of corruption at Bewdley there might have been some reason for allowing a new Writ to be issued; but, in point of fact, it appeared that the normal condition of Bewdley was corruption and treating. In 1848, a Committee of that House unseated Mr.

Sir George Jenkinson

Ireland on account of corrupt practices and treating; and that Committee passed the following Resolution, dated the 17th of March, 1848:—

"That it has been proved before the Committee that the practice prevailed in the borough of Bewdley at the last Election, as well as at that of 1841, of carrying away and treating electors, and that in consequence of this system large bodies of men were employed on both sides for the alleged protection of voters; and that almost every public-house and beer-house in the borough was kept open during a week, and drink given away to a large extent."

These charges, which were proved in 1841, and again in 1848, were once more substantiated in 1868, and the evidence given before Mr. Justice Blackburn would have been much extended, but for an apprehension that it might lead to the borough being disfranchised. In his opinion, it was clear that this incorrigible little borough did not deserve to have any representative in Parliament for the present. By suspending the Writ for twelve months, the House would assert its own dignity and its determination to preserve the purity of elections, while at the same time the electors of Bewdley would have leisure to reflect on the fact that the franchise was not conferred upon them in order that they might sell it for a glass of beer or a mess of pottage. The unseating of Sir Richard Glass had been no punishment to the borough. On the contrary, the electors were revelling in anticipation of new bribes and more beer. He (Mr. Muntz) had been informed that the respectable inhabitants on both sides were desirous of having the matter brought before the House, and he trusted that his Amendment would be passed as a terror to evil-doers. In conclusion, he moved that the issuing of a New Writ for the borough of Bewdley be suspended for twelve months.

MR. MUNDELLA, in seconding the Amendment, said, he had been assured by respectable inhabitants of Bewdley that a fair and a free election could not be at present held in that borough, because the large outstanding claims of publicans would exercise great influence in the choice of a Member. The borough did not contain more than 7,000 inhabitants, and he had been assured that from time immemorial it had been notoriously corrupt. Another reason for postponing the issue of the Writ was that they might now hope to have a complete change in the mode of conducting elections, and he trusted that the House would not so far stultify itself as to issue the Writ immediately after the able speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Writ for the Borough of Bewdley be suspended for twelve months,"—(Mr. Muntz,)—instead thereof.

MR. BREWER said, he hoped that, in an aggravated case of this kind, the House would exercise severity; and that it would vindicate its own consistency by suspending the Writ. If it were at once to issue the House would be looked upon out-of-doors as not being so sincere as it might be in its efforts to put down corrupt practices.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I trust, Sir, we shall hear from the Attorney General what the views are which he entertains with respect to the issue of this Writ. I would, moreover, express an earnest hope that whether we decide on issuing or not issuing a Writ in any of the various cases on which the Judges may have reported, our decision will in no degree be influenced by considerations as to what political party is likely to gain the vacant seat, for it is most important to the character of this House, and to the working of the new system of trying Election Petitions, that such should not be the case. I should wish to remind the House that, after having just issued a new Writ for Bradford, no sufficient reason can be urged why we should not take the same course with respect to Bewdley. Let me, for a moment, call the attention of hon. Members to the very strong Report of the Judge who tried the Bradford Petition with respect to the existence of treating in that borough. I find from that Report that Mr. Baron Martin arrived at the conclusion that, in one of its wards, corrupt practices on the part of the agents of Mr. Ripley prevailed to a great extent, and that upwards of 100 public-houses were open in his interest. The other Member petitioned against—the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education—was no doubt declared by the Judge to have been properly elected, but the evidence, even in his case, went to show that the extent to which public-houses were open in the borough was very great. Now, how do matters stand with regard to Bewdley? It appears that a practice prevailed there which we must all condemn—the practice of employing a number of voters as watchers. That practice has been very strongly condemned by the high authority of Mr. Justice Blackburn, and the gentleman who was returned at the head of the poll lost his seat, so that I hope a recurrence of the practice need not be much apprehended. In the last sentence of his Report, I may add, Mr. Justice Blackburn states that there was no reason to believe that bribery extensively prevailed at the late election for Bewdley, and in the face of such a declaration it would not, it appears to me, be in accordance with the usage of Parliament to suspend the Writ for that borough. I trust the House will see the propriety of concurring in this view.

MR. DIXON said, that in the case of Bewdley the Judge had reported that there had been three distinct cases of bribery; that indirect bribery had extensively prevailed by means of the employment of watchers; and that treating was rife in the borough. Now, it was against the latter description of corrupt practice that the House had chiefly to guard, for while bribery appeared to be diminishing in this country, treating seemed to be on the increase. It had not been shown that treating existed in Bradford before the last election. In that case, indeed, he believed it was exceptional, whereas nearly every public-house in Bewdley had, if he was not mistaken, been thrown open during the election, and, moreover, the practice of treating had existed there almost from time immemorial. Indeed, so bad was the state of affairs that some of the more respectable of its inhabitants had expressed to him a wish that the borough should cease to be represented in Parliament. He was of opinion that the very least the House could do under those circumstances was to suspend the issue of the Writ for a year, while he also thought the Government might with great propriety be asked to issue a Commission. If the Writ, at all events, were not suspended the country would have much reason for supposing that the House of Commons was not sincere in its desire to put an end to corruption.

MR. YOUNG said, he once sat for a large borough of 40,000 inhabitants (Yarmouth) which Parliament had disfranchised for corruption; and that, at the time, was regarded as a harsh measure. As Bewdley had sinned more than once, and had been reported against over and over again, he thought that to suspend the issue of the Writ for a year was a very mild punishment indeed.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: I very much agree, Sir, with what fell from the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington), to the effect that nothing can be of greater importance in these cases than that the House should proceed as far as may be judicially and consistently, without regard, or even the appearance of regard, to party interests. It is much more important that the House should do that, than that it should endeavour too anxiously to secure the credit of being sincere in its efforts to put down corruption; for I do not doubt the public will believe the House to be sincere in that respect, if it is consistent in the general tenour of the course which it takes with that object. I was, I must confess, very much impressed by the remark of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington), that it would seem somewhat extraordinary to the public out-of-doors, if we were to refuse to issue a Writ for Bewdley immediately after assenting to the issue of a new Writ for Bradford. Although the Reports of the Judges who tried the two cases are not drawn up in exactly the same terms, there is no very serious difference in the substance of the two Reports. Each speaks of extensive treating by the opening of public-houses. At Bewdley, also, the Judge reports the improper employment of men called watchers, but the Report expressly says that the Judge was not of opinion that extensive bribery prevailed. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Direct" bribery.] For my part, if I could have agreed in the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Muntz), I should not have agreed to the Motion for the issue of the Writ in the case of Bradford. But the issue of the Writ for Bradford was justified by this consideration, which, in my opinion, should chiefly govern the House in dealing with these cases. Some time ago it was more frequently than it now is the practice of the House of Commons to suspend the issue of

Writs, when the House had no definite purpose of taking ulterior measures for the punishment of boroughs. It was felt, however, that the assumption by this House of an arbitrary power to keep a constituency out of its share of the representation for some indefinite period, without any intention of resorting to ulterior measures, was dangerous and in some degree unconstitutional; and I have always understood, that it was very much for that reason provided, that when a Committee of this House should report that extensive corruption had prevailed at a particular election, and that there was reason to believe this corruption to be habitual, a Commission should issue to inquire into the fact, in order that if it were judicially established Parliament might found upon the Report future measures for the disfranchisement of the borough. Now the question is whether, in the case of Bewdley or Bradford, the Report of the Judge was a Report of such a nature as, under the Act of Parliament, ought to be made the foundation of a Commission to inquire into the prevalence of corrupt practices. If so, then let the Attorney General, with whom the responsibility rests, move the House to issue such a Commission. Should that be the opinion of the Attorney General, I, for one, should be perfectly prepared to support the Motion; but if, in the exercise of his judgment and upon his responsibility, he is not able to inform the House that the Judge has made such a Report as, according to the spirit of the Act of Parliament and the practice of the House, would warrant the issue of a Commission, then I am not prepared to agree to the re-assumption by the House of the arbitrary power of inflicting punishment upon the constituency at its discretion, for a time limited by itself, without contemplating the kind of judicial inquiry which the law provides, and with no other purpose than that of issuing the Writ at the end of a year or so. Had the hon. Member moved for a Commission he would have been taking a perfectly constitutional course, and would have only had to satisfy the House that the facts were sufficient to justify such a course. I shall wait to hear what is said by the Attorney General, who has, no doubt, looked into the evidence more carefully than I have done. But looking only to the Report of the Judge, it does not seem to me to be of such a character as would justify, under the Act of Parliament, the issue of a Commission with a view to the possible disfranchisement of the borough. In short, if there is no case for disfranchisement the House will be taking into its hands a dangerous power, liable to great abuse, and liable to the suspicion, just or unjust, that it was exercised for party purposes.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that as he had been directly appealed to from both sides of the House, he would state in a few words the opinion he had formed upon the subject. He had thought it right that the evidence in this case should be laid upon the table, because the Report of the Judge was a special one. Having read that evidence very carefully, together with the judgment of the learned Judge in reviewing the evidence, he was bound to say it appeared to him that the Judge's Report and judgment were entirely in accordance with the evidence. As to the practice of the House, after careful inquiry, he had not been able to discover that a Commission had ever been issued upon a Report of a Committee corresponding to that of the Judge in the Bewdley case. No Commission had issued, except in cases where there was reason to believe that bribery had prevailed to a great extent, and where there was a strong prima facie case for disfranchisement. Now, the effect of the evidence and the Report here was that there had been no bribery whatever—at least, no direct bribery. The Judge reported that there was a habit of employing watchers, which, although no doubt an objectionable practice, did not, in his opinion, amount to direct bribery. The Judge further reported that there had been extensive treating, but that it was confined to one side; and on the other side there was no treating. These were the facts stated in the Report of the Judge, and it was for the House to say whether, on such a Report, there was a prima facie case for the disfranchisement of the borough. His opinion was that there was not such a case, and, that being so, there would ordinarily be no Commission. Then came the question—Ought the Writ to be suspended? Now, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), that Writs ought not to be suspended arbitrarily by way of punishing a borough. They ought only to be suspended—and in general they had only been—with a view to inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices. He did not, therefore, see his way either to the issue of a Commission or the suspension of the Writ. At the same time, he hoped it would not be supposed that the Government were indifferent to the prevalence of corrupt practices as disclosed in the recent inquiries. On the contrary, he had himself moved for the evidence in those cases, and he should probably even have to move for the issuing of a Commission in one or two other cases; but he thought there did not exist in that instance sufficient ground for the issuing of a Commission or for suspension of the Writ.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he thought that that was a question which ought to be decided on the broad principle of common sense, and not with a reference to mere legal technicalities. It had been asserted, and it was not denied, that gross bribery and treating had prevailed at the late election at Bewdley; that there was a party in the borough who were anxious for the issuing of the Writ in order that they might again resort to corrupt practices; and that the best and most respectable portion of the inhabitants desired that the Writ should not be issued. Under these circumstances he believed they should best consult the dignity of the House by not issuing the Writ.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped the House would act judicially in this matter. It was a condition precedent to the issue of a Commission that a Committee of the House of Commons should report that bribery had extensively prevailed. This was not like the case of Bridgewater. Here, the Judge had stated that he had no reason to believe that direct bribery had extensively prevailed. If questions of this sort were to be decided by catch votes of this House, and not upon the Reports of the Judges, the effect of those Reports would be materially weakened, and it would be said out-of-doors—though he did not assert that hon. Members were actuated by such feelings—that the House had issued the Writ in the case of Bradford, but would not issue one in that of Bewdley, because there was reason to believe that the result of the Election would be different in the two cases.

MR. BRUCE said, the discussion which had taken place had satisfied him more than ever of the expediency of appointing a Select Committee to inquire into the mode of conducting Elections. The Motion of to-night had arisen from the want of an appropriate punishment for offences like this. The Government had carefully considered the expediency of issuing a Commission in this case, and, after great hesitation and doubt, had come to the conclusion that, considering the statement of the Judge, that direct bribery had not prevailed at the election; considering, also, that one of the contributory boroughs—Stourport—was absolutely free from bribery or treating, which was confined to one party within the borough, who had thrown open twenty-five or thirty public-houses to the lowest of the population, the case did not seem to be one for a Commission with a view to disfranchisement. He should be glad to supply an omission in his earlier speech by stating that in his opinion some middle course might be taken in cases not so clear and strong as to justify the appointment of a Commission with the view of possible disfranchisement, and that was to throw the whole cost of the petition inquiry upon the borough, so that all its inhabitants should suffer alike, and in that way perhaps a public feeling against corrupt practices might be created. He hoped that suggestion would be considered by the Select Committee. In the mean time it did not appear to him that the middle course proposed to be taken in this case was a just or right one. He could easily understand a great difference of opinion as to whether a Commission should issue or not, but it did not seem to him that the suspension of the issue of a Writ for twelve months was a course consistent with the dignity of the House.

The House divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 65: Majority 63.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown, to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Bewdley, in the room of Sir Richard Atwood Glass, whose Election has been determined to be void.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) (No. 2) BILL.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in rising to move that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate, amend, and make perpetual the Acts for preventing the introduction or spreading of Contagious or Infectious Diseases among Cattle and other Animals in Great Britain, said, that he did not intend to detain the Committee long, but as Gentlemen on both sides of the House took an interest in the question, it was desirable that he should state, as briefly as possible, the nature of the Bill. The Government had thought that the time was come when it would be much better to consolidate the Acts relating to contagious diseases among cattle. At present there were seven Acts in operation; indeed, he was not sure that there were not eight, for they had, within the last few days, discovered an Act, passed in 1798, which he thought hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House were scarcely aware of, regarding some diseases in sheep. At any rate, there were seven in force, and of these one passed in 1848 was a permanent Act, and the others were expiring Acts, which had been continued from year to year, and which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu) in the Bill which he brought forward proposed to continue. In the opinion of the Government it was better there should be only one Act. There was some difficulty among those who took an interest in the question in discovering the scope of the law regarding contagious diseases in animals, and therefore it was proposed to repeal the previous enactments. He stated that circumstance because it was some apology for the length of a Bill which might otherwise create some astonishment in the minds of hon. Members. He would first mention the internal regulations which it was proposed to establish by this Bill, and would at the outset refer to those which related to the Cattle Plague. It was proposed to re-enact almost precisely as they stood the present regulations for stamping out the Cattle Plague, should it unfortunately break out again—for giving the power of declaring certain places infected—for inspection—for preventing the removal of animals, and for compulsory slaughter, and the Bill also contained the same provisions with regard to compensation. The powers now enforced by Order in Council in the case of sheep-pox would be embodied in the Bill, but though they did not take power by Act of Parliament for the compulsory slaughter of sheep, they proposed regulations for preventing the removal of live sheep or carcasses without license in places declared to be infected with sheep-pox. There was another case in which they proceeded to new legislation, and they had not done so without much deliberation. They proposed to take powers to check other diseases than cattle plague and sheep-pox; in fact, they proposed to take power to check lung disease and foot-and-mouth disease—any contagious disease, in short, among sheep, cattle, or horses. They had done this for two reasons. In the first place, the facts elicited by the Government in the course of their inquiries proved that pleuro-pneumonia had been, from first to last, almost as dangerous and destructive as the cattle plague; and, in the second place, they had every reason to believe that the agriculturists generally were much more willing than they were formerly to submit to interference on the part of the Government. He believed that, a year ago, arrangements for this purpose were dropped in the House of Lords chiefly on account of opposition from the agricultural interest; but the Government had been informed by Gentlemen on both sides of the House that that was not the feeling of agriculturists now. They had seen the good results which had so evidently attended the exercise of summary power in the case of the cattle plague, and they were, consequently, willing to submit to something of the same character in reference to other diseases. But, in the case of pleuro-pneumonia, the Government did not propose to take such stringent powers. Upon the declaration by the Inspector that any premises, field, stable, or cowshed was infected by lung disease, that place was declared to be infected, and came under certain rules set forth in the Schedule of the Act, the main purport of which was that diseased animals were not to be moved out of such infected area, except for slaughter, and no animal that had in any way come into contact with infection was to be moved without license, except for slaughter. They proposed to make it penal to exhibit infected animals for sale in any market, or to turn them on to an uninclosed common, the same provisions being applicable in the case of scab in sheep, and they proposed to take powers to prevent animals being moved when diseased by road, rail, or steamboat. The definition of contagious diseases as given by the Bill was “the cattle plague, sheep-pox, pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, and scab in sheep,” and they took powers to enable the Privy Council to include other diseases in the list if it should be thought necessary to do so, providing however, that the least stringent of the regulations contained in the Bill should be applied in any such cases. The Bill re-enacted the powers at present existing for disinfecting and cleansing pens, sheds, and trucks, and to that category the Bill added steamboats and sailing vessels. These regulations were also to apply to glanders in horses. Another object which they sought to attain was the better provision for animals sent long distances by rail, the destination usually being London. They had received evidence showing that great suffering was undergone by animals so sent by rail—suffering which all humane persons must desire to see relieved, and which, arising as it did from the inadequate supply of food and water, especially in the case of animals brought from Scotland and the north of England, must naturally result in the deterioration of the stock. The Government were pressed by many gentlemen to take compulsory powers to compel the railway companies to provide food and water, but there appeared to be great difficulty in doing so. However, he hoped that the object they desired might be attained without their putting the railways under compulsory powers. The directors of railway companies stated that they did not provide food and water because they had no power to recover the expense from the consignor or consignee, and because they were bound by Act of Parliament to charge certain rates. What the Bill, therefore, proposed was that railway companies should make the charge of supplying the animals a debt upon the consignor or consignee, and that they should have a lien on the animals themselves for the debt. He now came to that part of the Bill which would be looked upon with great interest, not only by agriculturists, but by all those who paid any attention to the supply of our large towns, and that was the regulations with regard to the importation of foreign cattle. They proposed to take the same powers that were now possessed by the Government to prohibit the importation of foreign cattle into any part of the kingdom and from any foreign country. They did not think it possible for the Government to perform their duty and preserve the country from this terrible disease, unless this power was intrusted to them. At present the power of prohibition was vested with the Queen in Council; they proposed to give it to the Privy Council. Many hon. Gentlemen probably would perceive the distinction. When the power was vested in the Queen in Council, it might occasionally take some little time before the power could be put in force. When, however, it was lodged in the Privy Council, the power could be exercised without any delay by two Lords of the Council; and when the House remembered the necessity which frequently existed for immediate action, he believed they would generally approve the change. They also took power to permit the landing of foreign animals from any foreign country in any port or part of any port only on fulfilment of certain conditions; so that they took two powers—first, the power of prohibiting importation from suspected countries; and, secondly, of defining certain countries from time to time from which, under certain conditions, importation might be permitted. Those conditions were defined in the Schedule of the Act, and in that Schedule it was provided that these animals could only be landed at certain defined ports, at certain defined landing-places, and could only travel within certain defined areas within those ports. The cattle could not be removed alive from the limits of the defined area. Powers would be reserved to the Government, through the Privy Council, to, in the first place, mark out certain defined areas at the ports of import, into which areas the animals could be brought on their importation, but out of which no animals, home or foreign, could be taken alive. It would also rest with the Privy Council to settle from time to time what were the places from which cattle were not to be imported except on these conditions. With the exception of those places the importation of cattle would be free. In the Bill facilities would be given to the local authorities to construct markets and erect lairs and slaughter-houses, and sheds; and they would have power to take land, to levy tolls, and to borrow money on tolls or rates. No compulsory powers were taken for the construction of markets; but, though no such powers were taken, he had reason to hope that it would not be found that they were wanted either in the metropolis or at any other port. He need hardly say that this subject was one in which the Government would be anxious to receive assistance in respect of details. The question was not one to be regarded as in any way a party question. Certainly he felt his own incompetence for the discharge of the duty which now devolved upon him; but, seeing how very important the subject was, he had given his best attention to it; and both his noble Friend Lord De Grey and himself would be most anxious to receive any assistance from the representatives of agricultural constituencies. As to principles, there were two or three paramount ones. First, the Government thought that the time was come when all persons, and especially persons engaged in agriculture, would be content to put up with a certain amount of interference not otherwise desirable in matters of trade, but rendered necessary for the protection of all classes in the community. Next, as health was the normal condition of cattle as well as of men, the Government hoped that we should not have to look forward to a continued exclusion of foreign cattle. There could be no doubt that the restrictive measures had had a very marked effect on the importation of cattle not only in the metropolis but also in the provinces. Some gentlemen from Hull had furnished him with statistics which showed that, at that port, while the number of oxen, cows, and calves imported in 1865 was 45,864, the number imported in 1868 was only 8,534. Similar results had followed at Newcastle and other ports. There could be no doubt that so great a diminution in the number of cattle imported must have been felt very seriously by consumers. A cordon having been drawn round London, and no cattle having been allowed to be taken outside it alive, perhaps the effect of the restrictions on importation had not been felt in the metropolis so much as elsewhere. He had observed that this was no party question, and he would venture to hope that it was one in which interests even would not be supposed to conflict. There might be the interests of growers and importers, but he trusted neither of these would be considered to be opposed to those of the consumers. The interest of the consumer was plain enough—namely, that there should be only so much interference as was necessary to stop disease, and that there should be that interference. Since he had come into Office he had heard a great deal of argument and much strong statement on the subject of the cattle plague. Some persons boasted that it was not an English production—that it had been imported from Holland; and there were those who said that nothing but complete prohibition would secure us against a recurrence of the evil. However the cattle plague had broken out—there could be no doubt that it did rage in various parts of Europe. It was now in the eastern part of Europe; and no Government could think of permitting cattle imported from countries in which the disease existed to be brought in among cattle not infected with the disease. On the other hand, he thought no hon. Gentleman could suppose that we could expect to feed our enormous population without relying to a great extent upon foreign countries. Having thanked the Committee for the attention with which they had heard him, the right hon. Gentleman concluding by moving that the Chairman be directed to move for leave to bring in the Bill.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU congratulated the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) on the manner in which he had approached the subject, and expressed the pleasure he felt at hearing that the Government, not regarding the matter as a party one, were willing to receive suggestions from whatever quarter they might be offered. The first part of the Bill, it appeared, merely consolidated the existing Acts, not limiting—if he had understood right—but rather extending the existing powers. But then he could not understand what the right hon. Member meant by saying that, in the second part, he took powers to prohibit importation or to permit the landing on certain conditions. The power existed already. He thought, therefore, that the second part of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill must be a limitation on the first part, and a limitation on powers now possessed by the Privy Council.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed that, as by the first portion of the Bill the existing Acts would be repealed, it was necessary in the second part to define what the powers of the Privy Council under the Bill would be.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that he apprehended the meaning correctly, and feared that the second part of the Bill would limit the existing powers of the Privy Council. The power which he took to prevent the landing of cattle from infected districts would be found insufficient. In many cases it was impossible for the Privy Council to know that the plague existed in a particular country till after diseased cattle had been exported from that country, and, perhaps, landed in this. He would give examples—At one time, an enormous number of cattle infected with disease had been landed in this country from Holland a week before the Government received information that the disease had broken out in Holland. The Dutch farmers, knowing that their cattle had become infected, and fearing a general and serious stoppage of the trade, had hurried their cattle down to the water's edge, and telegraphed for steamers, and shipped those cattle over to England. Again, in May, 1867, forty head of cattle, which on their way to this country had passed through a country in which the disease existed, brought the infection with them. Those forty head of cattle were sold in the metropolitan market, and spread over the City and the suburbs. The first the Government heard of the evil effects of that occurrence was from a policeman who came to the office and stated that cattle were disappearing nightly from the sheds of several dairymen. The Privy Council then employed detectives, who found that the disease was abroad in London, and over 200 head of cattle had to be killed, and stringent measures used to prevent it from spreading. Yet these forty beasts, for whom 200 English beasts had to be sacrificed, had come from some foreign country, no one knew whence, and passed the veterinary surgeons in Berlin who gave a certificate of health, and had also been pronounced healthy by the English inspectors, and had been sold in open market. Therefore, he believed that to regard as an effectual safeguard the power to stop importation from countries in which the disease was known to exist was the merest delusion. As to the permission to land cattle from other countries, only if they were slaughtered in a separate market, he thought that this power was not large enough. For, in the first place, if this were not to be permanent, he did not think local authorities would be willing to construct markets and erect the necessary buildings. It would be like asking a man to build a house on a three years' lease. Secondly, unless the arrangement were general for all imported cattle, it would not be worth while to construct a separate market. A sufficient amount of tolls to pay the interest upon the capital to be expended would not be collected unless all foreign cattle were obliged to be sent to the separate market. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that there had been a diminution in the quantity of meat sent to the great towns in this country; but that was clearly an error on his part, because there had been an increase in the quantity of meat and in the number of cattle slaughtered in the country each year. He asserted, and he was prepared to prove the fact on the second reading of the Bill, that not only had the quantity of meat sent to London increased of late years, but that during the last fourteen years the dead meat trade had increased 72 per cent. Therefore it would not affect the question, even if the quantity of cattle imported had diminished in any slight degree; but he denied that in London or in any of the great towns there had been such decrease. The measure of the right hon. Gentleman appeared upon the first blush to be very good indeed in its first part, but the latter part of it, he was afraid, would not satisfy the agricultural interest. Without unduly praising his own Bill upon this subject, he thought it would be advantageous if the two Bills were to be referred together to a Committee of the Whole House, in order that the best parts of each might be adopted, and a measure framed which would forward the interests not of the agricultural class on the one hand, nor of the commercial class on the other, but those of the whole community.

MR. HEADLAM deprecated any discussion of the details of the Bill at its present stage, but expressed an opinion that the measure would be a very serious and important improvement upon the existing system. With regard to the foreign cattle trade, he could not express in too strong terms his opinion of the manner in which the existing regulations interfered with that most valuable trade, without producing any very great good to the country, or preventing the importation of disease. The right hon. Gentleman's Bill was divided into three parts, the first providing that cattle should be imported perfectly free from certain countries where disease did not exist, or where it had for so long been absent that there was no danger to be apprehended. No one would object to that portion of the Bill. The second part gave power to the Privy Council to absolutely stop the importation of foreign cattle from places which were dangerous, and no one would grudge the existence of that power, which was an exceedingly desirable one. As to the other part of the Bill, relating to places where suspicion of disease existed, he would offer no opinion until he saw the provisions. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu) seemed to desire that the present system should be made permanent and general, and that obstacles should be thrown in the way of the importation of foreign cattle for ever. He had no chance of agreeing with any one who held such views as that. He urged his right hon. Friend to proceed with his Bill as rapidly as possible, for it was important that there should be no unnecessary delay in passing a really good measure on the subject.

MR. DENT referred to the marked absence of Gentlemen representing the agricultural interest from the other side of the House, which was a pretty fair sign that they were not perfectly satisfied with the provisions of the noble Lord's Bill. The Bill of the Government seemed to deal with the subject in a larger and more genial spirit; for, while protecting fairly and honestly the home producer, they did justice to the foreign importer. He objected to the noble Lord's Bill being discussed in Committee with that of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. EGERTON said, he hoped the House would not discuss a Bill the provisions of which they had not seen. There would be a great desire, he was sure, on both sides of the House to produce a Bill which would be satisfactory and which would have the effect of cheapening the price of meat.

MR. NORWOOD said, that the right hon. Gentleman's Bill would be a liberal measure for the outports, and though it might not be entirely satisfactory to his constituents, it met with his strong approval.

MR. GEORGE GREGORY, as the representative of an important agricultural constituency, hoped the right hon. Gentleman's Bill and the Bill of the noble Lord would be considered together by the same Committee. His opinion was decidedly in favour of slaughtering cattle at the point of debarkation. No one who went to the noble market which had been erected in London could fail to be struck with the great importance of the carcase trade, which was steadily increasing; and it had been found that, with our present facilities of railway communication, it was much cheaper and better to send dead meat instead of living animals into the market. He hoped these things might be taken into consideration, and that we might be protected from disease of this dangerous and malignant nature.

MR. CHADWICK said, that as representing a borough situated in a county which had suffered more than any other from the cattle plague, he rose to express a hope that the prayer of many petitions which he had presented would be taken into consideration, and that while the mistakes or omissions of previous legislation were remedied, the House would seriously consider the great injustice which had been placed on the county of Chester. At the proper stage he should propose that a clause be inserted in the Bill to alter the legislation from which Cheshire had so grievously suffered.

MR. MACFIE pointed out that the people of Manchester were opposed to the slaughter of cattle at the point of debarkation. Their experience was that those restrictions had seriously injured both the shipping interest and, through the shipping interest, the great consuming interests of the country. The falling off in the import of cattle, including calves, for their use, had been rather more than four-fifths.

MR. HENLEY said, he would not give any opinion upon the multiplicity of powers contained in the Bill of the Government; but he hoped that among those powers there would be some statutable security to protect the people of this country, as far as possible, from the evil which might come among us, and not leave us as we were before to be worried by the exercise of every power imaginable on the face of the earth, till it almost became a question which was the greatest curse—the plague or the powers.

COLONEL BRISE said, he was of opinion that the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman would not prove satisfactory to the country. He denied that the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) was not supported in his views by the agriculturists of the country. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council would consent to the request of the noble Lord, and have the two Bills taken together. He believed we were now at the commencement of a great revolution in the meat trade of the country, and dead meat markets were now on a very different scale to what they had ever been before. In Harwich the dead meat trade had increased very considerably of late. By a Return which had been forwarded to him it appeared that, during the four months from September 1868, to the end of January, 1869, 7291 foreign sheep were slaughtered in Harwich, and in the corresponding periods of 1867 and 1868 there was not a single foreign sheep slaughtered at that port. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, had spoken of there being three interests involved in this question—the interest of the consumer, the interest of the agriculturist, and the interest of the importer. He maintained that the interests of the consumer and producer were the same, both requiring protection for their herds from foreign disease. The interest of the importer, however, was distinct, and might be opposed to both the others.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu) had pointed out as one of the difficulties of the Bill that the markets to be provided would not be permanent, but he would find a clause inserted to meet that difficulty. It would be somewhat premature to speak about the arrangements with regard to the future conduct of the Bill; but the Government were anxious to push the Bill on as quickly as the rest of the Public Business would permit. Any differences of opinion as to the importation of foreign animals would be most easily settled by Amendments to the Bill, which had been so drawn that those questions would be instantly raised by Amendment.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate, amend, and make perpetual the Acts for preventing the introduction or spreading of Contagious or Infectious Diseases among Cattle and other Animals in Great Britain.

PHARMACY ACT (1868) AMENDMENT BILL.

RESOLUTION. FIRST READING.

Act read; considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in moving that the Chairman be directed to move the House that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend "The Pharmacy Act, 1868," said the Bill consisted of only one clause. In England medical practitioners, who were generally licensed apothecaries also and veterinary surgeons, were able to take medicines with them and to dispense them, but in Scotland neither of those classes of professional men were able to dispense medicines; for there was no licensing power in Scotland for apothecaries, and many veterinary surgeons were licensed by the Highland Society, but were not veterinaries of Great Britain. It was a matter of serious consequence that this state of things should be altered, for it might happen that a doctor might be attending a patient in the Highlands some twenty miles away from the nearest druggist's shop. This Bill was to make the necessary change in the Act of last year.

An HON. MEMBER hoped the noble Lord would extend the wording of the Bill, so as to include the case of Scotch practitioners practising in England.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, on the other hand, thought that the Bill had better remain as drafted.

MR. BREWER said, he feared that the action of the Bill would be of a retrograde character.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend "The Pharmacy Act, 1868."

APPROPRIATION OF PROPERTY.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

LORD REDESDALE rose to move for a Return of all Acts of Parliament whereby property belonging to any person, corporation, or trust has been taken from such person, corporation, or trust without their consent, and without securing to them full compensation for the property so taken, or without offence being charged against such person, corporation, or trust justifying such confiscation. Their Lordships would no doubt perceive that his Motion had reference to the proceedings now pursuing in regard to the Church in Ireland, and it was important they should know what had been done by Government and by Parliament hitherto with regard to such property. His belief was that the Return would afford no precedent for such proceedings as these with regard to the Irish Church, and if any statutes were to be found which dealt with any analogous subject they were such as their Lordships would scarcely wish to adopt as a precedent. A great deal of misconception, he thought, had arisen from the use of the terms which were now employed. The substitution of "disendowment" for "confiscation" seemed to have misled many persons as to the character of the movement. "Disendowment" meant "confiscation." In whatever was left to the Church after the legislation which was now commenced there would be no disendowment, and whatever was taken from the Church was pure "confiscation." Parliament, in dealing with property, had always, and especially of late years, been most careful to secure to all parties, whose property was interfered with by legislation, proper compensation for any damage, or for any compulsion which they had to submit to. Parliament had been most careful in that respect in all Improvement Acts, in all Railway Acts, and in all Acts for public works. It might be said that in the present case com-pension would be provided, but he denied that compensation was provided for many of the parties who were thoroughly entitled to receive it. The clergy did not alone constitute the Church; the laity were as much a part of the Church as were the clergy—and in the scheme now before Parliament, particular care was taken that the laity should be represented in the governing body to which the charge of the Irish Church was to be committed. But no compensation whatever was proposed to be given to the laity for that which was to be taken away from them. He had heard it said that there was a technical ground for that, inasmuch as none of the property of the Church was vested in the laity, and that all who had vested interests in the property, clergymen, patrons, and others would be compensated. But the laity, who were to have services which were extremely valuable taken away from them, were to receive no compensation whatever. Now it was notorious that many persons had rights over the property of others, which rights could not be taken from them or could not be infringed upon without compensation being provided. If a man had a house on the extreme verge of his property, and overlooking the property of another, he had a claim to the lights which he enjoyed from that property, and those lights could not be taken away, and if the owner of that property desired to erect any building on his own land which would interfere with them, he must obtain consent and pay compensation. In like manner a right of way which any man possessed over the property of another could not be taken from him or interfered with without entitling him to compensation. In like manner the laity have a claim on the property vested in the clergy for rights enjoyed by them from that property, and applying the instances of light and way before mentioned to those rights, it would be found that the laity were in possession of the light of the Gospel, which they had received from the Church for ages; which it was now proposed to take from them, without any compensation. In like manner, the laity had a road open to them—the road to salvation—through the Church which taught them; but it was proposed to take that away also, and without compensation. The rights of the laity had not been at all considered in the measure now before Parliament, and it was important that those rights should be maintained. The Return for which he moved had some reference to the position of the Government; for if no previous Act of Parliament could be found of a similar character to the Bill now before Parliament on the subject of the Irish Church, the present Government would stand in the position of interfering with the rights of property in a manner which was, in fact, the commencement of a revolution. The primary object of government, as defined by Lord Macaulay, and by other authorities against whom no objection could be raised, was the protection of the lives and property of the people, and that definition had been accepted and published by the present Premier, in his recent autobiographical sketch. If that primary object was departed from in the least degree, the proper application of that definition was at once upset. As a homely instance he might say that the police and magistrates were founded for the protection of life and property; but if the police were all thieves and the magistrates supported them, the primary object of both would be destroyed, and the public would not believe in the security of property. In like manner if a Government became spoilers of property in one instance, and Parliament abetted that spoliation, what security was there that the primary object of Government would be respected, and that spoliation would not be carried out in other instances? The reason assigned for the present movement against the Irish Church was that the majority of the population of Ireland were Roman Catholics, and were jealous of the possession of this property by its present owners, who were the minority and from whom they differed. Now, common sense would at once show that no doctrine could be more dangerous than that, because one class were jealous of the possession of property by another, Parliament might step in and appropriate it on such terms as it thought fit. Dangerous as such a doctrine was as regarded property generally, it was peculiarly so when applied to Ireland, for it was notorious that, over a large portion of that country, the occupiers of land held that the legal owners, who were of course a minority, were not entitled to it, and that they themselves ought to be the owners. This, in truth, is the "land question" which is the question of the day in Ireland. The tenant has often often enforced his view of it by murder, and the principle on which it is proposed to despoil the Church may be applied to the landlords, and lead to a fearful social convulsion. He believed that last Session he was the first to apply to disendowment its proper name of sacrilege; and, though hard words had been applied to him on that account, he maintained that the definition was undeniable. No one who knew the definition of the word would contradict him. Johnson called it "the crime of appropriating to oneself of what had been devoted to religion." A frightful crime was involved in an act of sacrilege, and he challenged anyone to show that the appropriation of what had for centuries belonged to the Church and the services of religion to the relief of the county cess was anything else than sacrilege. It being necessary to find some good reason why Parliament should commit such an act, it was argued by that portion of the Press which supported this policy that the people, at the late election, had declared in favour of those beautiful words "disestablishment" and "disendowment," and that it only remained to consider how to carry out this foregone conclusion. Now, his political experience and acquaintance with history did not dispose him to think that the decision of the people at a General Election was always a reliable basis of action. It was no uncommon thing for the people to reverse the decision of one General Election at the succeeding one, and he thought, in the present case, if there were another General Election at no distant period the decision might probably be the other way. There could be no justification, therefore, on this ground for the crime of sacrilege, and he believed that the more those who were called upon to decide this question reflected on the personal responsibility resting upon them, the less inclined would they be to divert to secular purposes property which had so long been devoted to the cause of religion and truth. Some of the arrangements proposed appeared to him to be exceedingly objectionable. Tithes were to be disposed of to the landowners at twenty-two-and-a-half years' purchase. Now, did anybody believe that this proposal had any other object than to conciliate the landed proprietors, who were, for the most part, Protestants, and who strongly objected to the scheme on religious as well as on political grounds, believing it to be not only impolitic but sinful? Nothing was commonly deemed more profligate than to try and bribe people to do what they believed to be wrong or wicked; yet what was this proposal but an offer of property to the landed proprietors at a reduced rate as a profitable investment, in order that they might be induced to accept what they felt to be wrong? He wondered this view of the matter had not occurred to the promoters of the Bill. He could only attribute this, and the manner in which the measure had been received by many to that blindness of heart which was so common a cause of mistakes and sins, and which prevented so many people from seeing the question in its true aspect, and perhaps it may be partly attributed to the terms in which the scheme was disguised. He would submit to the consideration of the House two cases. Suppose a man were to say to another—"I know you are extremely favourable to a particular charity; it is one which confers great benefit on many, and might confer benefit on a great many more if we had sufficient funds; I think, if you would assist, we could do something to augment those funds"—the reply would be—"Well, I should be most happy to do so, but what do you propose?" If the answer was—"Why, I wish you to commit an act of petty larceny; I assure you we are safe against detection, and we will devote the money exclusively to the charity," what would anybody of right principles say? Would he not tell the man who so addressed him—"Much as I wish to benefit the charity, I think your proposition disgraceful to yourself and insulting to me?" Suppose the same man soon after to meet another who should say to him, "Will you join me in a movement which will bring our party into Office, and probably keep them there, and which will conciliate the Roman Catholics in Ireland?" and should reply to him—"These are excellent objects, what do you wish me to do?" and if the answer should be—"Only to commit an act of sacrilege without any risk to yourself," ought not the reply to be the same as in the former case? Where was the difference between them? In the one the crime was petty larceny, in the other sacrilege; in the one the proceeds were to be devoted to an excellent charity, in the other—along with a little personal advantage and a party triumph—the state of Ireland was to be improved. Why, then, has the answer been so different in too many instances? Was it the prospect of party success, or the use of new phrases which had concealed from many the sacrilege lurking under the proposal, and produced that blindness of heart under which so many suffer. Speciously as the scheme had been brought forward, he hoped that, on reflection, its true character would be recognized, and that all honest men would become sensible of the fearful responsibility they incurred in supporting it.

Moved, That there be laid before this House, a return of all Acts of Parliament whereby property belonging to any person, corporation, or trust has been taken from such person, corporation, or trust without their consent, and without securing to them full compensation for the property so taken, or without offence being charged against such person, corporation, or trust justifying such confiscation.—(The Lord Redesdale.)

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he had stated on a former evening that his noble Friend was one of the best men of business in the House, and the one most conversant with its usual practice, and, therefore, he was never more surprised than when his noble Friend, on coming down to the House the other evening, on his first appearance this Session, gave his Notice of Motion. Part of the noble Lord's speech had been marked by that strong religious feeling and earnestness for which he was conspicuous, while in other parts he had indulged in some facetious comparisons of the policy of the Government to the commission of petty larceny. Now, he (Earl Granville) fully admitted the right of the House to anticipate by discussion, in whole or in part, the question of the Irish Church, that measure which might possibly be sent to them, and to which the noble Lord had somewhat irregularly referred. But if so important a question was to be discussed, he thought he had at least a right to claim that due and fair notice of such an intention should be given. With regard to the proposed Return, he had consulted a most learned Friend, as to what it could mean, and whether it referred to the Irish Church. The reply was that it must refer to endowed schools, and could not relate to the Irish Church, because a man like the noble Chairman of Committees must be aware that the Church was not a corporation, and was not legally a trust, while no proposal had been made to take away a single sixpennyworth of property from any person possessing it. Under these circumstances, he would only say that while his Colleagues and himself would not shrink from discussing any of these questions, if brought forward after due and proper notice, he thought the House would agree with him that he had better not continue the present debate. With regard to the Order itself, to whom was it to be addressed? If it should be addressed to any Department of the Government, the usual course would have been an Address to the Crown; but he did not see that any Department could undertake the work, and he believed, technically it would be addressed to the Clerk of the Parliaments. Now, had he a doubt on any subject involving political, historical, legal, or moral questions, there was no one to whose judgment and knowledge he would sooner appeal than to his learned Friend (Sir John Lefevre); but he protested against forcing upon any officer of the House the gigantic task of not only wading through the entire Statute-book, but also of deciding upon those questions of fact and law which were involved in this Order. The noble Lord would, perhaps, consent to omit the latter part of the Motion, and insert instead, "with the reasons stated in such Acts for the appropriation or transfer of such property." The labour would, he thought, be very great, and the facts might not turn out of much use; but possibly they might assist the House, when the subject came to be discussed, in deciding whether the views of the noble Lord were sound, or whether the opinions of men like Hallam and Sir James Mackintosh were right; that there was no principle to be found sufficient to refute the common notion that private and public property stood on a different footing.

An Amendment moved to leave out from ("consent") to the end of the Motion, and insert ("together with the reasons stated in such Acts for the appropriation of such property."—(The Earl Granville.)

LORD REDESDALE, in reply, said, the alteration suggested by the noble Earl, which would include all cases in which compensation had been given for property taken, and was consequently the reverse of what he had moved for, would bring in Railway and all other Public Improvement Acts, and immensely increase a labour which otherwise would be extremely light. As to the wording of his Notice he thought it obviously had an application to the case of the Irish Church. The noble Earl had not attempted to answer his arguments, not desiring, as he said, to enter into the question now. The noble Earl had objected that the Irish Church was not a corporation; but he must be aware that every Bishop, dean, rector and vicar was a corporation sole, and he (Lord Redesdale) had used the words "person, corporation, or trust" as covering all public or private property. He should be the last person to press for the Return if he thought it would impose much labour on the officers of the House, but he believed very little investigation would be necessary, and that the Return would be that no such Act was to be found.

EARL GREY said, he hoped the noble Lord would withdraw the Motion. He could not think it desirable that such a Return should be ordered for the mere purpose of supporting an argument which the noble Lord could use quite as effectually without it as with it.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had no objection to withdraw the Motion on the ground stated by the noble Earl (Earl Grey). If it was admitted that there was no Act of the kind, the fact was sufficient for his purpose, and he would not give unnecessary trouble.

Then the said Amendment and the original Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS BILL—(No 18.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

LORD PORTMAN said, this was an important measure, and in the right direction; but at the same time he thought it would require careful consideration in Committee, for there were many of the clauses which, in his opinion, were not calculated to carry out the object which its framers had in view. He thought that in an important question of this kind it was better to proceed tentatively than to attempt too much at one time, and so incur the risk of failure. He had himself considerable experience in dealing with the criminal classes, and he thought there was an omission from the Bill of a large class of criminals who were not felons but misdemeanants. As instances of the kind of misdemeanants who might properly be brought within the provisions of the law he would mention the passers of base coin, who were considered only as misdemeanants, but who certainly belonged to the class of "habitual criminals," because they were usually the companions of thieves and assisted them to carry on the trade of thieving, and they ought to be put in the same category with them. He believed also it might be worth their consideration, as they had dealt with pawnshops, to deal also with the marine-store dealers. He believed that in numerous instances these shops were receptacles for stolen goods, and he would ask his noble Friend whether it would be too much to deal with them in a Bill of this kind. There was already, indeed, an Act of Parliament that dealt with receivers, but men of this class who had been previously convicted were as much "habitual criminals" as any other of the criminal classes. There was another omission in the Bill. The Bill dealt with the owners of those houses where thieves found a lodging. He thought that was a proper provision, for the persons who kept those houses were often more criminal than the thieves themselves. But the clause required a very clear definition of the word "owner," and he would suggest some such definition as was contained in his noble Friend's (the Earl of Shaftesbury) Artizans' and Labourers' Dwelling-houses Bill, where the word "owner" was defined to mean the occupier of the premises. Upon the whole, however, he agreed that the measure was a step in the right direction, but it would be better not to press it too far at first, and he would be glad to assist his noble Friend in perfecting its provisions in Committee.

LORD ROMILLY said, he approved of the Bill, but there were some alterations he wished to suggest in it, and which he hoped his noble Friend would think worth consideration in Committee. He agreed with his noble Friend (Lord Portman), both that it was a good measure, and that it required a great deal of consideration in Committee, if its object was to be effectually accomplished. He understood that the Bill was directed to offenders against property, and that it was not intended to deal with offenders against the person. In that view he had one or two observations to make on its provisions. He wished to point out to their Lordships the great power—the too great power, he thought—that was given to magistrates to act against criminals. By the 10th clause, by the first of three circumstances enumerated, it was provided that any magistrate who had a reasonable suspicion against a person who had been twice convicted might sentence such person to imprisonment for one year, and he alone was to be the judge whether the grounds for such suspicion existed. This was a mere arbitrary power which could be enforced without assigning any reason against an industrious and reformed convict whom the magistrate disliked. The 14th clause shifted the burden of proof, in the case of the receivers of stolen goods who had been previously convicted, from the accuser to the accused. He objected to that in the case of persons put on their trial for the first time, but, if surrounded with proper precautions, he thought it might be applied to persons who had been previously convicted. But then arose the difficulty which he pointed out last year in reference to the Bankruptcy Bill. It was scarcely possible to put a man on his trial and say that he should be convicted unless he could prove his innocence, and yet to refuse that person the right and the power of giving evidence on his own behalf. Then, if they gave the accused that right, they must also give the prosecution the power of cross-examination; and this would lead to the introduction, to some extent, of the system of examining prisoners, which was adopted in continental courts. Whether that was a proper mode of endeavouring to discover the truth, he need not now give an opinion: but their Lordships must consider the change which would thus be worked in the jurisprudence of the country if that system were introduced here. Another point in the clause in question he wished to notice was the provision that a man might be brought before a magistrate if he had once been imprisoned for any offence. But this surely did not mean if a man in a drunken row knocked down a constable, and was sent to gaol for it, that that should be such an impeachment of his honesty as to put on him the burden of proof if he were afterwards accused of theft, or that a man who had committed manslaughter should be held to be, prima facie, guilty of a burglary committed on his neighbour's house. Offences against the person ought to be distinguished from offences against property. There was another suggestion he wished to make. His noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley), in introducing the Bill had dwelt with much force and had brought forward valuable statistics to show the great number of persons who made a trade of thieving—who formed a sort of army making war upon society. He believed that was true; but he thought that if we merely endeavoured to repress crime by punishment we should succeed but very imperfectly. It was a recognized fact, that there was a great disposition on the part of children to follow the vocation of their fathers, and in the case of the children of thieves there was scarcely any alternative. They became thieves because they were educated in the way, and had no other trade to apply themselves to. To strike at the root of the evil he would suggest that if a man committed felony, all his children under the age, say of ten, should be taken from him and educated at the expense of the State. That, unquestionably, was a new proposition, and it would require great consideration. It might perhaps be said that it was putting a premium on crime, and that a man who wanted to provide for his children need, in that case, only commit felony to accomplish his object; but he believed the effect would be just the contrary. He believed no respectable person would commit felony for such a purpose; and that if we knew more about the feelings of thieves, their Lordships he believed would find that there was among them a particular species of morality, that they were not devoid of natural affection; that though they considered themselves the enemies of society, yet they had fidelity towards each other and affection for their children, and he believed their Lordships would find that to take their children away from such persons would be a very effectual mode of punishment: and he believed the expense, which would no doubt be considerable in the first instance, would be more than re-paid by the diminution of crime in after years. Whether he should feel it his duty to press this in Committee would depend on the support it was likely to receive. There were two matters to which he might refer. It was very desirable that something like uniformity should be established in the punishments awarded to prisoners. With the Judges at Westminster Hall there was, whether expressly or impliedly, a scale by which punishments were awarded for different offences; but with magistrates and at quarter sessions, there was nothing of the kind. Undoubtedly, a large latitude and discretion must be permitted; but he still thought that it was possible that some scale might be established which would do away with the glaring differences which so frequently appeared between the punishments awarded in different parts of the country for offences of precisely similar character. He would also throw out, as a suggestion, whether it was worth while to make a criminal plead at all either guilty or not guilty, with the almost certain knowledge of everybody that, if he pleaded not guilty, in nine cases out of ten the plea was a falsehood. He ought simply to be put on his trial as soon as his identity with the person mentioned in the indictment was admitted by him or proved, and he should not be encouraged, as he is now, to utter a deliberate falsehood on a solemn occasion when the discovery of truth was the real object. These, however, were but subordinate matters. He had merely thrown these suggestions out for the consideration of his noble Friend, and would assure him that he would do all in his power to assist him in carrying into effect what was the real object of the Bill—the reduction in the number of criminals and the better security of property.

LORD HYLTON said, there was no doubt in his mind nor, he believed, in the minds of their Lordships, that some change in the law was absolutely necessary. Unfortunately, their mode of dealing with criminals hitherto had not been a success. He agreed with the general scope of this Bill, but on the other hand, he thought it might be very easy to carry the principle on which the Bill was framed too far. No doubt the object which the release of convicts on tickets of leave was intended to attain was to afford to the convicts so released the opportunity of returning to industrial occupations, and earning for themselves an honest livelihood. When the Act of 1864 was passed it was made imperative upon persons holding tickets of leave to report themselves to the police in the districts where they resided—that regulation had been greatly complained of by many persons, because if these persons were periodically, month after month, obliged to appear at a police-station, which sometimes might be at a considerable distance from their residences, there was a great chance of the fact coming out that they had once been thieves, and then they were likely to lose their employment, by which means the great object which was sought to be obtained by the issue of those tickets was at once defeated. But the new Bill went further, and gave power to a police-constable to take up any individual without any offence, but on mere suspicion. This would make it still more difficult for persons of that class to avail themselves of any opportunity to do good to themselves or to obtain employment. He thought the power given to a single policeman to apprehend, or to a single magistrate to commit such a man on mere suspicion was not only too great, too vague, but represented a principle hitherto unknown to our law. He did not object to the rules and regulations with respect to licenses. They might make them as stringent as they pleased, he had no fear that under the control of the Secretary of State they would be made too hard. What he should suggest was, that the fourth clause of the Bill should be struck out. He approved of many of the suggestions of the noble and learned Lord who spoke last, (Lord Romilly) but he certainly could not agree with his suggestion that the State should take and educate the children of criminals. He did not believe, indeed, that such an inducement would lead any respectable man to become a thief; but there was a pretty large class which, though not criminal, was not very respectable, and the temptation to them of having their children provided for by the State, he feared, would be stronger than they could resist. With respect to the clauses that dealt with houses which were the habitual resort of thieves, he would remind their Lordships that many of them held licenses, and he would suggest that for the first offence the license should be taken from them, whether it was granted by the Excise or by the magistrates. He trusted that a Bill so important as the present one would receive full discussion at their Lordships' hands.

Lord Romilly

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: I think, my Lords, that the principle of this Bill it is impossible for any one to gainsay. Certainly, the principle is a perfectly legitimate one, that those who have been guilty of repeated offences should, after the expiration of their sentences, for the better security of society be placed under constant supervision. But then the character of that supervision must depend very much upon the greater or less discretion with which it is exercised. If you carry the supervision beyond a certain point and make it too stringent—as by this Bill I think it certainly will be—you probably run the risk of a great evil, because you will be shutting up more closely than they are now shut up all the openings to employment and access to industrial occupations. A man watched at every step and moment of his existence, and becoming more notorious, as he is sure to be before long by the action of the police and a thousand other circumstances, will find the door of ordinary employment shut against him, and will be driven to the choice between violence and starvation. Your Lordships will recollect that, when the Bill of 1864 was before this House, your Lordships listened to the arguments which I used, and rejected the proposal rendering it imperative upon a ticket-of-leave man to report himself to the police once a month. The House of Commons, however, restored the clause, and your Lordships not insisting on your Amendment, the Bill containing that provision received the Royal Assent. I am satisfied, from the minute inquiry that I have been able to make, that the provision has been nearly an absolute failure. I know that the eminent man, whose recent loss we so much deplore—Sir Richard Mayne—thought otherwise, and that the system had been successful. I do not think that the success was such as Sir Richard Mayne anticipated. It must be remembered that the stringency of that provision drove many of the principal thieves from London, and thus though the effect of that provision might have been in some degree to purify the metropolis, I do not believe it in any way purified the country. For a long time a vast number of these men did not and have not reported themselves, although it is true that a large number have done so. The noble Earl has stated, on the authority of the late Sir Richard Mayne, that the police have through this clause been enabled to procure employment for a good many of the ticket-of-leave men. When the noble Earl made that statement I have no doubt that he altogether believed what he said, but he has adduced no proof, and I think I may safely defy him to do so. It may be that some situations have been obtained for these men through the exertions of the police and the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society; but the direct action of the police in this direction has been vain. At any rate, of this I am certain—that, whatever Returns the police may make of the places they have obtained for released convicts, they have not obtained anything like the number that those men obtained for themselves before the adoption of so stringent a provision. The burden of the provision, indeed, presses upon them with great weight and severity, and many—I have heard from some this very day—who have been anxious to forsake the life they had been leading have found this clause a great obstacle, because the result of their reporting themselves is frequently to reveal the fact that they possess tickets of leave not only to their employers, but—what is a more serious evil—to their fellow-workmen also. The greatest obstacle to the employment of these men at present is the body of men with whom they are to be associated. Now, my Lords, let me point out to you in what way this extended system of supervision would act. I desire to guard myself against possible misrepresentation in respect of what I am about to say of the metropolitan police. I admit that the superintendents, the inspectors, the sergeants, and a very great majority of the men of that force are honest and upright men, and discharge their duty with efficiency, and in a manner that entitles them to the thanks of the community; but we must remember that the police force is a very large body. It consists of some 7,000 or 8,000 individuals, and in such a number it is impossible but that there must be some individuals of indifferent character. From time to time we see in the police reports cases in which bad conduct has been proved against policemen; but what is proved in private we do not see; but if we had access to the records in the offices of the Police Commissioners we should find that the Commissioners have to deal with many cases in which complaints are privately made of members of the force, and that men are dismissed because it has been found that they are unworthy of being trusted. Again, I say that these are only exceptions to the general rules and that the majority of the body discharge their duties honestly and properly. But when considering the power, proposed to be given to police-constables by the 4th clause of this Bill we must not forget that we are about to put great power into the hands of some men at least who are exceptions to the general rule. Now, my Lords, the 4th clause states that—

The clause then goes on to state that the police-constable may take such holder of a ticket of leave before a magistrate, and that, if the prisoner is unable to show that he is pursuing an honest course with the view of gaining a livelihood, the magistrate may send him back to the punishment from which he had been relieved. There are many men who having been convicted, and having subsequently obtained tickets of leave, are now earning an honest livelihood and are in the receipt of good wages. Now, though the policeman might say nothing to the man yet it might be pretty clearly conveyed to him that unless he were willing to pay hush-money he would be arrested and exposed. It is easy to get up a case of suspicion against a man. He may be made to pass through a suspected locality or may be accidentally brought into the company of persons whom there is good reason to suspect. A bad policeman could effect this by indirect means. Well, the holder of the ticket of leave goes before a magistrate, and what happens? He proves that he is earning an honest livelihood, and the magistrate dismisses him. He returns to his work, and his employer dismisses him also. It has occurred before now that men have been dismissed by their employers under somewhat similar circumstances, and will be likely to occur still more frequently under the present Bill. How can you compensate a man for such a loss as that? You cannot do it; and yet you expose men who may be earning an honest livelihood to the danger of that happening to them if they refuse a demand for hush-money, or in any other way give offence to a dishonest police-constable. I know at the present moment a young man who, though convicted, is now in respectable employment, and in the receipt of good wages. He is living in terror lest, under the circumstances to which I have referred, this provision having become law, he may be brought before a police-magistrate, and with the inevitable consequence of being discharged by his employers. Depend on it that hundreds of men in that position are now watching the progress of this Bill. I do not object to stringency of punishment provided you accompany the system with such safeguards as will keep men from being exposed to the danger of losing that employment without any fault of their own. I think, indeed, it would be well if you wish to carry the whole of this Bill with its stringent provisions, you must introduce something very similar to the regulations for criminals in Ireland; you must have a public officer to whom must be committed the charge of the discharged criminals—a man who would exert himself with a view to their welfare, and who might be the means of obtaining for many of them an honest livelihood. Certainly, if something like this be not done, I am much afraid that a provision such as that which I object to in this 4th clause will create a new kind of crime, to which men will be driven by a feeling of desperation. I do not believe that the number of professional thieves is nearly so great as has been stated. The number of persons who are leading a dishonest life may be 20,000 or even more than that; but, when we speak of the “habitual criminals,” the persons who give themselves to robbery and burglary as a profession, and desire no other mode of living, I believe the number might be reduced to one-third or one-fourth of 20,000. I believe you will effect a great deal in putting down crime by stringent measures as against the receivers of stolen goods and the keepers of marine stores, the latter denomination being only another name for receivers of stolen goods. The dealers in marine stores should be required to take out a license. Then with respect to smelting-pots, no one should be allowed to use smelting-pots except under the superintendence and supervision of the police, who should regulate the hours at which the smelting-pot was to be used. But, my Lords, it is not only to dealers in marine stores and the keepers of smelting-pots that stolen goods are disposed of. I believe that the largest depôts for such articles are beer-houses and low public-houses, By means of these places facilities are afforded for enormous plunder in London. Into them stolen articles are carried in detail and deposited until a heap is collected, when a person calls and takes the collection away, leaving a sum of money for the person or persons by whom the goods have been deposited. My Lords, I do not think that in this country, and with the advance of what may be called civilization, it will ever be possible to put down the practices of those who carry out robbery and burglary on principles of high art. The 20,000 robbers and burglars, of whom mention has been made to your Lordships, are vulgar practitioners; the highest order of thieves and burglars are persons of high intellectual power, scientific knowledge, and very considerable ingenuity, who, if they were engaged in honest pursuits, would, many of them, be sure to rise to high distinction. This class is much more likely to increase than diminish, because the whole of their system has been reduced to a complete science. No one can doubt their ability who has seen some of the instruments they have constructed. I heard of one of them the other day who has great skill in chemistry and photography. He boasts that in a very short time he could open any safe or break through any door that could be devised. I am told that this higher order of burglars and thieves meet from time to time as a kind of British Association for the advancement of science. In their conclave they compare notes and talk over the advances that have been made in their art. Those men are proud of their intellectual powers and glory in their practical achievements. I by no means concur in what has fallen from a noble and learned Lord this evening that the children of thieves are always thieves themselves, and that being such they should be specially regarded as objects of the public care—it is by no means the case. With the many and various temptations around them, we have almost as much to apprehend from the children of the better, as from that of the most degraded classes. Now as to another point. At present the law passes a far severer penalty upon the commission of the second offence than upon the first. I am not going to plead on behalf of those who have sinned once and a second time; but I wish to state that I believe that in a great number of instances the man is less guilty in committing the second offence than in committing the first. You may go through the list of all the thieves in the metropolis, and you will find very few instances in which the first offence was committed under the pressure of distress. The first is generally committed under the influence of bad associates, a desire for money, habits of gambling, the company of abandoned women, or similar causes. Nineteen-twentieths of first crimes are caused by these things; but on the second occasion crime is often perpetrated under circumstances of the greatest distress. A person has been convicted of an offence and sent to prison. He comes out—he has lost his character—and finds it impossible to get a living by honest means. He commits a second theft, and is punished more severely for it than he had been for his first offence. It is right that he should be punished for the second offence; but I think he should be punished with a degree of mitigation if it be found that he has committed the second offence under circumstances which make it more excusable than his first offence had been. We are not considering, in the present Bill, the question of the repression of crime generally, but of the repression of habitual crime. The repression of crime is a much larger question, but I believe it may be treated with great hopes of success if we proceed to deal with it in the right way—by getting hold of the children of the poorer classes, bringing them up in the way they should go, and providing them with decent and honourable employment. By means of existing institutions many thousands of these children are now engaged in industrious occupation. There is another subject which I cannot pass over on the present occasion, and to which your Lordships' attention will very shortly have to be directed—I mean the class of cheap literature of the day which exercises a most deleterious and deadly influence over the children of all classes—an influence so great that even the parents of the worst families complain of the effect produced upon their families. The seeds of evil sown by this means will not fully ripen for some years, but if this class of literature be not repressed, in ten years' time its consequences will crop up in the most deadly proportion. I hope at some future time, with your Lordships' permission, to bring before you the whole subject—not with the view of asking your Lordships to pass a law upon it—because I believe it is beyond all law—but to set public opinion to work, which alone is capable of effectually dealing with this source of evil. I thank the Government heartily for having brought in a Bill of this character, and I hope that, with a few Amendments, the measure may be made to fulfil the important purpose for which it was intended.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I regard this measure as being, in many respects, a most valuable one, as it is, undoubtedly, a move in the right direction. In some respects, indeed, I should be inclined to say it scarcely goes quite far enough, while many of the clauses will require to be much modified before the Bill becomes law. I will not, however, trouble the House with any general observations upon the principle of the measure, but will content myself with referring to the remarks that have fallen from my noble Friend behind me (Lord Hylton), and from the noble Earl who spoke last. They both dwelt upon the fact, which is, after all, one of the most interesting facts of the whole measure, indeed the very essence of it, the supervision of discharged criminals. I want your Lordships to remember that transportation having now ceased, and ceased within only a few years, we have not as yet experienced the full effects which will result from turning out our criminals upon the country, and we must expect that, in a few years hence, a much greater number of criminals will be discharged upon the country than has been the case in former years. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley), in introducing the Bill the other night, told us that at the present time 1,500 or 1,600 criminals were discharged annually from the Government prisons; that that number would shortly amount to 2,000, and in a few years it might amount to 3,000. But, in addition to that number, there are upwards of 100,000 prisoners discharged annually from the various county and borough prisons, and I venture to say that a large proportion of these 100,000 criminals are quite as able and quite as apt in deteriorating and contaminating the rest of the population as the 2,000 or 3,000 convicts turned out from our great establishments. Under these circumstances, we have this alternative before us—we must devise means either for the absorption of these criminals into the great mass of the population, or for dealing with them by supervision. I do not see myself that there is any other alternative open to us in this matter. If we do not place discharged criminals under supervision we must take means to facilitate their absorption into the great bulk of the population. I cannot quite agree with the noble Earl when he says that the system of supervision has never been resorted to before, because it was adopted in the Act of 1864, and has been carried into operation with, as I am prepared to contend, very considerable success. The noble Earl dwelt upon the hardship which he says this system of supervision must entail upon its objects. I am far from saying that occasionally hardships might not have to be endured under its operation; but it must not be forgotten that Sir Richard Mayne, whose experience was so varied and so extensive, thought favourably of the system of supervision; and also General Cartwright, who has likewise had very considerable experience, reported in the most favourable manner of it. The system of supervision instituted by the statute of 1864 was that the discharged convict should report himself periodically to some person appointed for that purpose by the chief constable of the district. It is perfectly true that there have been evasions of those conditions; but the reason of those evasions is that each district has acted as it were by itself. Each chief constable has acted on his own authority, without very often being in communication even with the chief constable of the next district. The result has been that many persons have evaded the conditions by transferring themselves from one jurisdiction to another, where there was no means of identifying them, or of following them in any way. The Bill, however, provides a distinct remedy for the defects in the present system by directing that it shall be further extended, and it further provides that the system shall be consolidated, organized, and regulated by the establishment of a central criminal registry in the metropolis. I look upon the establishment of a central registry as the keystone of the whole system, and the Bill, by providing for it, will prove a great boon, because it will prevent many of the hardships and abuses which were pointed out by the noble Earl as likely to result from the adoption of a general system of supervision of discharged criminals. In that registry, which it is now for the first time proposed to establish, the whole of the antecedents of the discharged prisoners will be carefully entered. I had myself, last year, the opportunity of seeing in Liverpool a registration office which has been established there in order to provide for exactly the same object, and I understand, on the same principle, as that sought by the present measure. I inquired very carefully into the operation of the office, because I was most anxious to know what the manner of its working was; and so far as the inquiry led I satisfied myself that that registration made the supervision of the district a very effective piece of police machinery; and, so far from acting with any hardship toward the persons registered, it obviated all abuses, the convict himself entering into free communication with the officers of the registration department, who were frequently able to provide the men with honest employment. If the registry provided by that Bill could be of a similar character, and could act in the same way, he was convinced that it would be a great boon and benefit. I must, however, take the liberty of pointing out to the noble Earl opposite, who has charge of the measure, what I anticipate will prove a great improvement of one of its provisions. The noble Earl proposes to place this registry under the control of the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police. Now, I think that the registry ought to be in close and direct communication with the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, but I do not think that it should be placed under his control. The Commissioner of Police has already a large amount of business continually pressing upon him, and if this registry is to be effective it will require very careful and attentive management. Under these circumstances, I think that it should be placed under the control of an officer specially appointed for that purpose. In the next place the metropolitan police force is but one authority out of many, and there is no reason that I know of for investing it with peculiar privileges and powers; and, lastly—which is the strongest argument of all—my right hon. Friend must remember that the police are employed in detecting and hunting out crimes, and are constantly acting as prosecutors, while the officer placed at the head of this registration department would be acting just as much in the interest of the ticket-holder as against him. His business should be quite as much to find them honest employment as to prove that there had been a previous conviction; and he ought, accordingly, to stand as an independent and neutral authority. I would wish to see the authority at the head of this department occupying an intermediate position between the police and the discharged convicts. It is by no means one of the least merits of this Bill, in my eyes, that it contains provisions affecting the sentences of magistrates at quarter sessions and the punishments awarded under them. I know very well that it is a delicate matter to limit the discretion of the justices in awarding sentence. We discussed that question at length some three or four years ago. I recognize the validity of the argument that, if you have Judges, able, competent, and trustworthy men, it is well to place trust in them and repose in them every discretion. But the real answer is that which was touched upon by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Romilly) that there is great diversity in the sentences of the Judges and magistrates at quarter sessions, and that if you can, by legislation, give them some standard and scale according to which they may frame their sentences, you are securing a very valuable object of judicial practice. It is not to be forgotten that the Act of 1864 did adopt the principle of limiting the discretion of the justices by laying down a certain minimum sentence. How far and in what way their discretion is to be limited is a question of degree into which I will not enter. It is a very difficult question; but at the same time it does seem to me that there are some principles which emerge from the wilderness of surrounding difficulties. The Bill contemplates two cases—that of a man who has been twice, and that of a man who has been thrice convicted of felony. I will take the case first of a man who has been convicted twice. The Bill is perfectly right, I think, in treating the second conviction as a proof of incorrigible guilt; for I am sorry to say that I believe, generally speaking, in spite of what fell from my noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury)

a second conviction is evidence that a man is becoming a confirmed criminal. I have certainly known cases where the fact was otherwise, and also cases where it was doubtful. But, on the other hand, I think it clear that the punishment for the second conviction ought not, under any circumstances, to be less than the punishment for the first. This is not a principle laid down in the Bill, but I think it well worth consideration whether such a limit as that might not be imposed. In awarding sentence too much regard is had very often to the value of the thing stolen rather than to the offence committed against the law. A man, for instance, whose first offence consists of stealing a sheep is committed to prison for nine or twelve months; but if, on the next occasion, he carries off some eggs he escapes with a couple of months' incarceration. I am convinced that is a mistake, and that the practice is harder in its results upon the criminal than if it had imposed upon him a severer sentence. Nothing can be more mischievous to the district to which a man belongs than his return after a short period spent in prison. Then, take the case of a man who has been convicted of felony for the third time. The Bill very rightly acknowledges that it is necessary to impose upon such a man a sentence of seven years' penal servitude. But I venture to ask my noble Friend why he stops there—why he limits the punishment though the offence may be repeated. The principle which should be acted upon is that punishment should go in proportion to the number of convictions. If seven years' penal servitude be a suitable punishment for three convictions, fourteen years would not be too great a punishment for four, and twenty years for five or six convictions, as the case might be. And this leads me on to say that I do believe in many of these cases it is a great misfortune that we do not impose longer sentences of incarceration. Numberless cases come before the criminal courts in which there have been as many as thirty convictions—sometimes forty, and I have known myself where there have been even fifty. It is idle to say that the subject of so many convictions is not absolutely and hopelessly hardened; they belong to a class of persons on whom punishment is really wasted, and the only thing that remains is to shut them up for the rest of their lives and keep them out of the possibility of doing any harm to society. I believe that such a course is best for them and for society, and that no objection to it can be reasonably urged. The convict establishments of this country are already paying their way, and the surplus cost is very light; on the other hand, if you look at the cost which a criminal puts the State to in his detection, trial, and other criminal proceedings, it is perfectly clear that the cheapest course for the country would be to shut him up. As far as the man himself is concerned, it is also the most humane and the kindest course. He exchanges a most miserable state of life outside the prison walls for one of comparative cleanliness and order inside. And if you calculate the time which such a man has spent in prison, broken only by the shorter intervals during which he has been let loose and again re-captured, it will be found that the difference between the period actually spent in prison and a life-long sentence would really be very slight in amount.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE wished to know why the operation of the Bill was to be confined to England and Wales? In one place, and in one place only, was the United Kingdom mentioned, and that was in the clause which provided for the establishment of a register of convicts. If the measure was attended with the degree of success that was anticipated, he feared the criminal classes would find existence in England so disagreeable that they would take refuge across the Border, or across the water, as the case might be—which would naturally prove very disagreeable to the country receiving them, which had already a sufficiency of the class manufactured at home. He was, of course, quite aware that the criminal law of Scotland differed in many respects from that of England; and, consequently, the clauses of this Bill might not in all respects be applicable. But he was informed that the Bill did contain provisions which were applicable to the case of Scotland, such as the clause which proposed upon a person once convicted the burden of subsequently proving that he was earning an honest living; and perhaps the Government might usefully refer the point for the consideration of the Law Officers.

LORD HOUGHTON: My Lords, I take a deep interest in this question, because the early part of this Bill—the most important part of its principle—is nothing more nor less than an extension of that principle of police supervision which I myself induced your Lordships to throw out in 1864. The Bill came here late in the Session, and the clause which your Lordships struck out was re-inserted in the Bill in the other House; and now, after a space of four years, your Lordships are asked, not only to retain that principle of supervision, but to extend it much further—and to carry it, indeed, to such an extent that, I do not hesitate to say that, if Parliament should pass this Bill in its present form it will be the duty of every man who takes an interest in the welfare of the criminal classes of the country to get the system of ticket of leave abolished altogether. Already the supervision exercised is such as to neutralize all the advantages that lie at the bottom of the ticket-of-leave system—namely, the enabling a certain portion of the criminal classes, after they have undergone their punishment, to be again absorbed in the population. Under this measure, however, a man once convicted would be an object of continued persecution and supervision; he would be liable to be hunted down by any policeman who was his enemy, and sent back to prison under circumstances of great exaggeration. I am very glad, from the remarks of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Portman), who is so high an authority, and the noble Earl who takes so deep an interest in these matters (the Earl of Shaftesbury), that this question will be seriously debated in Committee, and I trust that these clauses will be struck out. I wish to say one word on this principle of police supervision. Surely it would be well to consider whether, in admitting this principle—very new, alien to the habits of our people, and liable to be abused by some members in so large a body as the police—we are gaining anything of substantial value sufficient to authorize your Lordships in departing from your former legislation? If you can show me that the effect of adopting the principle of supervision will be such as really to root out the criminal classes, or even to make crime so difficult, so annoying, and so miserable as greatly to lessen the number of persons who are addicted to it, no doubt in such a case no theoretical principle of the liberty of the subject ought to stand in the way. In 1846 I had the honour of introducing a Bill into the House of Commons for introducing the reformatory system. Experience has since shown that all attempts to check the progress of crime in England by legislation of this kind, unaccompanied by preventive measures, have been totally useless. What is this Bill? I venture to say it is not the Bill of the present Government or of any Government at all—it has come to them from without. It is true that a distinguished authority has told us lately that this is the proper course of legislation, and that in obeying the voice of public opinion the Government did its duty. Now I must say that I think the author of this Bill ought to be named. The real author of this Bill is Sir Walter Crofton. It is the embodiment of the principles on which that gentleman consistently acted in his Irish practice, and which he has urged very strongly upon England for some years at public meetings and otherwise. No doubt a great deal of good has been done in Ireland; but there is this difference between the two countries. The measure has been in a great degree carried out in Ireland under Sir Walter Crofton's personal superintendence and that of subordinates whom he educated in his system. In this way the measure has, no doubt, been productive of great advantage in Ireland, and the evils incident to police supervision have been very much reduced. Now, however, we are asked to carry out a measure in England with all its disadvantages of a departure from our established social system, and to do it without any such men as Sir Walter Crofton or his trained subordinates to superintend its working. What will be the practical result of the Bill if it becomes law? That a large number of the criminals of this country may, at any moment, be taken up by the police and sent back to prison. And for what amount of incarceration? For a year. Have your Lordships reflected on the enormous number of men who are now living under distinct police supervision, who are known to the police both by sight and by name, and any one of whom, if this Bill passes, may be apprehended and committed to prison for one year? I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that not less than 1,000 persons might be taken up under this clause. If the effect of that would be to clear the country of so many criminals I am not the man to demur to it; but when the year is over the men will come out again, and they will find themselves under the same circumstances, equally incapable of any other life than that which they have pursued, and there will be no other resource but to send them back to prison for another year. I agree with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) that if you wish to deal finally and absolutely with these criminals there is no other way of doing it except by some form of imprisonment for life. In short, whether in respect to severity on the one hand, or laxity on the other, there is more in the Bill to criticize than to applaud. I shall be glad if the clauses of this Bill can be considered in a Select Committee of your Lordships' House. My noble Friend cast some slur on the proceedings of the Select Committees of this House; but during the short experience I have had in your Lordships' House, I have never seen a mode of discussing serious subjects in which matters have been more fairly stated and more deeply judged and considered than in Committees of your Lordships' House. I trust that, in any event, when the clauses of this Bill come before your Lordships they will receive the greatest consideration.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, he hoped the Bill would not be referred to a Select Committee. It was desirable that such a Bill should be brought directly under the consideration of the public, and that could only be done by a discussion in the full House. He trusted the Government would not allow the measure to be frittered away by the elimination of the clauses relative to police supervision, because the principle of police supervision was the essence of the measure. He quite agreed with what was said by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Shaftesbury) as to the necessity of providing an able coadjutor for the Chief Commissioner of Police, to assist him in the discharge of the increased duties which would necessarily be thrust upon him. He begged to differ, however, from the noble Earl, who thought that a trifling second offence should be as severely punished as a grave second offence. So far from an extreme punishment for a trifling second offence being desirable, or likely to promote the object in view, it would have quite a contrary effect. For himself, he thought it was very doubtful whether a man who had been convicted three or four times was ever afterwards absorbed in the honest and industrious portion of the population. There was a great deal of truth in what had been said as to the desirableness of finding some sort of employment for criminals in certain cases, and he hoped some mode of doing this would be devised in connection with the registry to be kept for criminals. With respect to punishments, there was undoubtedly a great advantage of having a scale, so as to introduce some degree of uniformity; but such a system could not be rigidly carried out, and it would be better in all cases to leave a latitude for circumstances that might arise. Still there should be rather more classification than was contained in the Bill. In its essence the measure was a good one; it was a great attempt to meet an admitted and increasing evil. It was necessary to do something, and he believed the measure proposed by the noble Earl would meet with the general concurrence of the House.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, before replying to one or two of the objections which had been made against some of the provisions of the Bill, which he would do very shortly, wished to clear away some misapprehension which existed out-of-doors with reference to a statement he made the other night as to the value of convict labour. It was extremely important that there should be no misunderstanding on this point. Those who looked to the judicial statistics alone might think he had been incorrect in stating that convict labour re-paid the expense of the maintenance of the convicts; but a memorandum had been prepared upon the subject by Colonel Henderson, late Director of Convict Prisons, which showed that the estimate made by him had not been made in any mere arbitrary manner, but was based strictly upon facts. That memorandum, which was open for the inspection of noble Lords, was to this effect—

“The valuation of the labour of the convicts employed on the public works at Chatham, Portsmouth, and Portland is arrived at by actual careful measurement, priced out on a Schedule of Prices which have been approved by the three public Departments—namely, the War, Admiralty, and Convict Departments, for whom the convicts work, and a resumé of the details of the measurements is published annually by the Directors of Convict Prisons and laid before Parliament. Every possible effort has been made to render these measurements and valuations unimpeachable, and the whole system will bear the most rigid investigation. The remissions are governed entirely by industry, tested by measurement of work, good conduct being a sine qua non; misconduct involving loss of credit gained by industry. The reports of prison chaplains do not affect a prisoner's remission."

Passing from this point he desired to make one or two remarks upon some suggestions that had been thrown out in reference to the Bill, and for which he felt very much obliged. The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) had adverted to the great hardship that would result from convicts upon license being required to report themselves monthly to the police. He quite agreed with the noble Earl in that observation. It was obvious that such a system would put these men to great inconvenience, for if they were in employment, they would have to ask leave once a month in order to go and report themselves to the police. That would prove a great hindrance to the man in the way of earning his livelihood, and was not at all necessary for the purposes of proper supervision. All that was wanted in reality was that convicts at large upon license should report to the police any change of residence. This gave quite sufficient control over him, and the monthly reporting system might therefore be very well dispensed with, and he understood that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had no objection to such a course. Clause 5 of the Bill provided that the Secretary of State might insert in any license, granted under the Penal Servitude Act, conditions different from, or in addition to, those contained in the Penal Servitude Act. This would, to a very considerable extent, meet the objections of his noble Friend; for he was not at all disposed to disagree with the noble Earl in thinking that the police supervision should not be carried too far. He thoroughly agreed with his noble Friend that, in exercising control over the convicts, care should be taken not to exercise it in such a way as to prevent them returning to honest employment. If they made these men desperate they would become worse instead of better, and caution was consequently essentially necessary. While this was so, however, they would all be of opinion that a certain amount of police supervision was not only necessary, but might be maintained without injury to the convicts. Colonel Henderson had prepared a memorandum upon the present mode of conducting this supervision in the metropolis, and in order to give their Lordships correct information on the subject before the Bill went into Committee he proposed to lay the Paper on the table with a view to its being printed, and similar information would, if possible, be procured from other parts of the country. He wished the House to observe that the great object of the Bill was to make the supervision more perfect, as at present it was not sufficiently satisfactory in consequence of the absence of the registry and that species of supervision which it was now proposed to establish. His noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) had made some objection as to the mode of keeping the register; he would see if improvement could be made in that respect. The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) drew a melancholy picture of the position of thieves and ill-doers unable to obtain employment in consequence of the supervision they were now subject to, and he was astonished to hear the noble Earl go so far as to say that a man was rather better when he committed a second offence than he was on the commission of his first offence. If that were so, it would be hard to say to what degree of improvement he might have arrived when he committed his tenth offence. Neither could he go along with another noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) who thought that the punishment of a man should be increased in severity in proportion as his offences multiplied. That would be proceeding upon the reverse of the principle of forgiving one's adversary seventy times, and would rather be rendering him liable to seventy times more punishment than he might receive for the first crime. Such a continually ascending scale of punishment could not be carried out. The Bill went quite far enough when it declared that the minimum sentence for a third offence should be penal servitude for seven years. A noble Lord who spoke early in the debate (Lord Hylton) had directed attention to what he called the evils that might arise from vesting very large powers in the hands of a single policeman. When their Lordships came to read Colonel Henderson's memorandum, however, they would find that these large powers were not vested in the hands of a single policeman,—at all events, not in London—because that functionary had no power to arrest until he had reported to the Chief Commissioner and received instructions. That was the principle upon which the system of supervision embraced in the Bill would be worked out. Judging from the debate which had taken place the general feeling of the House seemed to be in favour of the Bill; and he thought that when the measure went into Committee it would be perfectly possible to discuss all the Amendments which might be desirable. He had been asked why the Bill was not extended to Scotland? The reason was because the criminal law in Scotland differed so very considerably from that of England that it would be impossible or inconvenient to embrace the two countries in a single Bill. Should this Bill be passed he had no doubt that the introduction of a similar system into Scotland would be looked upon favourably.

POST OFFICE — AMERICAN MAIL CONTRACTS.—QUESTION.

MR. BAZLEY said, he would beg to ask the Post Master General, Whether the late Government, before its retirement from Office, renewed the Cunard Contract for seven years at the annual rate of £70,000; the Inman Contract for the same period at £35,000 per annum; and the North German Lloyd Contract at a letter-rate charge, terminable at six months' notice? he had given Notice also to ask, whether such contracts, if granted, are not infractions of the implied promises of Members of the late Government that in future a self-supporting system of Ocean Postage should be established?—but refrained from doing so at present; he however asked, whether, under these circumstances, it will not be the duty of the present Government to withhold the ratification of those contracts?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: With regard to the first Question of my hon. Friend, I have to state that the old contract with the Cunard Company terminated on the last day of December, 1867; the arrangements for the conveyance of the mails between England and America for the year 1868 were of a temporary character, and included a fixed subsidy to the Cunard Company, and a payment at so much per weight of mails carried to the Inman Company, the North German, and the Hamburg American Companies. In August of last year tenders were advertised for by the Government for the conveyance of the mails for the present and future years, and, after some negotiations with the various companies concerned, contracts were entered into with the Cunard Company for two services a week for the yearly subsidy of £70,000; with the Inman Company for one service a week at £35,000 a year, and with the North German Lloyd Company at a payment of so much per weight of mails carried. It is therefore not quite accurate to say that the contract with the Cunard Company was renewed by the late Government, because an interval of one year occurred between the old contract and the present one, and the terms were very different. I am glad my hon. Friend has postponed his second Question, because it is not one which I should be justified in answering. The subject will be again before the House, and it will then be possible for my hon. Friend and those who agree with him to urge their views of the case, and for the Members of the late Government to defend their action in the matter. With regard to the last Question, I have to state that the contracts were completed before the present Government took Office, as far as they could be completed without the sanction of Parliament; they were placed on the table of the House on the 2nd instant, and if not disapproved within a month from that date they will become binding.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would like to know whether the noble Lord would take any steps for the establishment of 1*d.* postage between the two countries?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, this was a question that might very properly be discussed when the question of the contracts came before the House.

NAVY—GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

QUESTION.

MR. PEASE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that after objecting, on the 29th May, 1865, to the creation of the sinecure office of Governor of Greenwich Hospital, he has constituted that office, with a salary of £1,200 a year; whether it is true that any of the seamen and marines of fifty-five years of age, and who have been for five years on the pension list have, in consequence of the appointment of the Governor of Greenwich Hospital, not received the pension intended for them; and, whether it is intended to increase the number of the medical officers of the Navy at Greenwich, or to allow them any pensions from the Greenwich Hospital Fund?

MR. CHILDERS: In answer to my hon. Friend, I have to say that on the 29th of May, 1865, being then a Junior Lord of the Admiralty, I objected to the creation of the sinecure office of Governor of Greenwich Hospital, and that on the 8th of June, in Committee on the Greenwich Hospital Bill, I defeated my gallant Friend, now Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay), who moved to insert a clause for this purpose, by 57 to 53. But he renewed his Motion on the Report upon the 18th of June, and on the part of the Admiralty, I gave way, and a clause was inserted in the Bill under which I undertook that on Sir James Gordon's death the office with a reduced salary should be continued. It happened that I was at the Admiralty again when Sir James Gordon died, and it has been my duty to carry out the arrangement. But the salary of the Governor is only £433; and as he remains on the active list, no additional charge for pay or half-pay is involved. In reply to the second question, I am happy to be able to say that there is no truth in this suggestion. The fact is just the reverse. One of my first acts was to inquire whether the 5*d.* a day pension might not be extended to all seamen and marines who had been for five years on the pension list, and were fifty-five years old, beyond the 5,000 originally proposed. This has been done, and the result is that instead of 5,000 men receiving £48,000 in 5*d.* and 9*d.* pensions as I proposed in 1865, 5,412 men now receive £59,407. In reply to the third Question, I may state that I certainly do not propose to appoint more medical men to Greenwich or any other hospital than are required for the public service, merely in order to give employment and salary, and I have no reason to anticipate that any more such officers will be required. Although it was not originally intended to give any medical pensions out of the Greenwich Fund, the Order in Council of the 16th of February, 1866, established fifteen such pensions of £80 and £50, at a cost of £780 a year. As to the intentions of the Admiralty with respect to this and other matters connected with Greenwich Hospital, my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) will before long make a full statement to the House.

FALSE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES AND ADULTERATION.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL in rising to call attention to the state of the Law as regards the use of False Weights and Measures and the Adulteration of Food, Drink and Drugs, said, this was a most important question, and one which affected the interests of gentlemen who lived in comfortable houses at the West End, quite as much as it did those who lived in garrets in St. Giles's. The subject was an old and trite one. If he recollected rightly, Mr. Scholefield the late Member for Birmingham had brought one portion of the question before the House, and had succeeded in passing a Bill upon it, and on the latter portion of the Motion his successor had also introduced a Bill last year, which had obtained a second reading, but was not passed into law. The hon. Member for Frome (Mr. Hughes) had also brought forward a Motion on the subject of weights and measures, but from whatever reason it might be, whether it was from the inherent difficulties of the question or from the fact that the Government of the day had been always unwilling to undertake so difficult a task, all the well-intentioned efforts of hon. Members to legislate upon the matter satisfactorily, or to rouse public attention to the present state of the law had hitherto proved fruitless. When he asked himself why it was that this great nation, which boasted itself to be so practical and which was always ready to take up the grievances of other people, had submitted so tamely to this monstrous and increasing evil, the only answer he could give was that what was everybody's business became nobody's. But if any hon. Member doubted the magnitude of the evil, he would refer him to a Return which he had moved for last Session, of the number of convictions for the use of fraudulent weights and measures in the metropolitan districts between the 1st of July, 1867, and the 1st of January, 1868. According to that Return there were no less than 659 convictions in the metropolitan area, and that was exclusive of the five districts of Southwark, Newington, St. George's (Hanover Square), Paddington, and the Strand, which, for some reason best known to the local authorities, had made no return whatever. In other words, it appeared that, according to the Return, there were at the rate of 1,300 convictions for the use of fraudulent weights and measures in the year, and he need hardly tell the House that, with the imperfect system of inspection which now existed, for one person convicted probably three escaped. But if anyone was curious enough to analyze this Return still farther, he would find the most astonishing statistics as to the way in which the poorer classes in this metropolis were habitually cheated. Now, taking the City of Westminster—and he did not do so for the purpose of casting any slur upon it, because he believed that if, as happened to be the case, it stood at the head of the list, that circumstance was owing not to the fact that it was worse than its neighbours, but rather that the duty of the inspectors had been better discharged—well, in the City of Westminster there were 100 persons convicted in the six months, and, on examination, he found that of these twenty-four, or nearly one-fourth of the whole, were licensed victuallers and forty-seven were dairymen, green-grocers, cheesemongers, and others who supplied the poor with food, making in all 70 per cent of provision dealers. That would give the House some idea of the great extent to which this kind of fraud was carried out in the case of the poorer classes. The only wonder was that any result of the kind had been made public at all; because, when he looked at the number of inspectors who were employed in large districts, he could not but think that it was beyond the physical capacity of any man to discharge the duties properly which fell to their lot. He found that in Middlesex, one of the most important counties for its wealth and the number of its houses, though the smallest in area, there were only four inspectors of weights and measures, and that not only were these gentlemen compelled to do their duty in the county, but that many districts which would otherwise have fallen under local Acts were visited by them also. He was quite aware that the system of payment, too, was anything but what it ought to be. The inspectors of weights and measures were paid in a manner unfair to the public and to themselves—namely, by the very objectionable system of fees, and the consequence was—as happened the other day in Middlesex—when the moiety of fees did not come up to the travelling expenses of the inspector, there was a direct premium to his sitting still and doing nothing. He was also aware that in many other districts of the metropolis there were what were called "Local Acts," under which the local bodies appointed their own inspectors. But of the way in which those inspectors did their duty, he could not give a better idea to the House than by stating, what he had on the best authority, that in the district of St. Pancras there were twenty-four gentlemen appointed by the vestry without any stated remuneration whatever, and in the parish of Islington there were twelve gentlemen appointed by the vestry at the magnificent salary of £30 a year, to be divided amongst them. He left it to the House to imagine how an unpleasant duty of this kind was discharged when it was paid for in that way. He should probably be told by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade when he got up to reply, that the whole of this question was under consideration, that there was a Commission at this moment sitting, and that their Report might shortly be looked for. But that was exactly what he complained of. For the last two or three years that Commission had been sitting, and when any Members who took an interest in the subject asked Questions or moved for Returns, they were invariably told that the matter was under consideration. And all this time there were hundreds and thousands of the poorer classes who were suffering because there was no legislation on the subject. He would now pass to that portion of his Motion which related to the Adulteration of Food and Drink, a subject which concerned the welfare, comfort, and happiness of the poorer classes quite as much as that on which he had already spoken. There were many Gentlemen in that House who, no doubt, thought that the questions which interested the poorer classes were those which had to do with the ballot, the re-distribution of seats, or the Irish Church. But these were mainly political questions; the question of which he spoke was a question of daily food, a question very often of health or sickness, and he might even say of life or death. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in one of those addresses by which he had electrified his constituents and the public, stated that the great panacea for the ills of the working classes was a free breakfast table. Now he (Lord Eustace Cecil) was the last person in the world to object to any revision of taxation, if it were based upon really sound grounds. But, with all due deference to the right hon. Gentleman, there was one thing of even more importance—namely, a breakfast table free from all impurities. It was not necessary for him to appeal to medical gentlemen, in or out of that House, to prove that purity of food was of vital importance, whether to the child in its cradle, to the boy at school, or the workman who had to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. Those were simple truisms with which anybody who had thought upon the matter at all would not hesitate to agree. Purity of drink was also of the greatest importance to the poor, because many of the vices and crimes common to that class were connected with it. Take, for instance, the criminal brought before a court of justice, or the case of the soldier and the sailor when brought to the bar of a court-martial, and ask them what it was that first got them into trouble. Their answer would be that it was some nasty stuff they drank at a public-house. Or go into any of the streets of our large towns, and ask some of those wretched women—the disgrace of our civilization—who were to be found there, and they would tell you that much of their wretchedness was due, in the first instance, to drugged liquors. Well, what, under these circumstances, had the Legislature done in that matter? As far as he could make out, it had simply punished the crime of adulterating food by a trumpery fine, quite disproportionate either to the offence or the wrongful gains of the delinquent. And here he would briefly examine the state of the law. Passing by the 9 Anne, the 17 & 56 Geo. III., the 3 Geo. IV., the 1, 6 & 7 Will. IV.—Acts all relating more or less to the adulteration of beer, tea, and bread—the first comprehensive Act which dealt with the subject was the 23 & 24 Vict., which was passed mainly through the efforts of Mr. Scholefield; and he ventured to say, in no disrespectful spirit to that Gentleman's memory, that that Act was a mockery and a delusion, and had entirely failed in its object. Many of them would recollect that a Committee sat in 1855-6 to inquire into that question. A number of witnesses of the highest scientific acquirements were examined, the public attention was generally drawn to the matter, and the result was—he was sorry to be obliged to call it so—one of the most ridiculous measures that ever became law. After reciting that the sale of adulterated articles of food and drink, being hurtful to health, ought to be repressed by more effectual legislation, it enacted that the person selling such articles, knowing them to be injurious to health, should be subject to a penalty not exceeding £5 and costs; so that any tradesman might, as far as that clause was concerned, knowingly ruin his neighbour's health on paying £5 and costs. Then, for a second offence, if he had as was probable, poisoned scores of people, and ruined the health of scores of others, the justices had power—to do what? To imprison him, or send him to the Assizes? Not a bit of it; but to publish his name, residence, and offence in any way they thought desirable at his own expense. Thirdly, the Act gave a power—which he believed never had been put in force—to appoint analysts, but not a word was said about the payment of them. Fourthly, it provided a protection, forsooth, against articles of food being tampered with by purchasers. Fifthly, there was a power for the purchaser and the justices to have food analyzed; from which it would appear that the purchaser had to test the food at his own expense. And, lastly, it was provided that this precious Act was not to apply to medical drugs or articles usually taken or sold as medicine. So that it came to this, that the baker who adulterated a loaf of bread with a certain quantity of alum was, if convicted, to be punished with a fine of £5 and costs; but the chemist, who had to supply the necessary medicine to get rid of the alum, escaped with perfect impunity. There was not a word in the Act about the appointment of a really good body of inspectors or supervisors, which he thought a most important point; and he should be very glad to see in any measure brought in on that subject, that an efficient body of such officers was to be appointed, so that any penalties which might be enacted by law should be really enforced. Perhaps some might think he took rather an exaggerated view of the present state of adulteration as far as food and drink were concerned; but let such hon. Members, if there were any, read some of the evidence given before the Select Committee to which he had referred; and if they thought that commercial morality was superior now to what it was in 1856 and 1857 he would request them to look at the too frequent cases which constantly appeared in the papers of fraud, both in high and in low quarters. But if they wanted some more modern testimony as to that point, he would refer them to the very able Report drawn up by the chemical officer of the Board of Revenue, Mr. George Phillips; and if they were still dissatisfied he would suggest to them that they should go to the first public-house in town, or out of it, and ask for a glass of beer. He would not trouble the House with a long list of all the disagreeable things which they had to swallow, nor with details of the exact quantities of alum, or red lead, or vitriol, or any other of the pleasant compounds which had been known to enter into their daily food. It was sufficient for him that it had been shown, on indisputable evidence, that those things did exist. It was said that a man must swallow at least a peck of dirt in his lifetime, but he suspected that many of them had to swallow a great deal more. He might mention what occurred not very long ago in the Committee on the Malt Tax, of which he was a Member. Every agricultural witness examined before that Committee testified to the fact that the beer sold in public-houses was adulterated. Now, in speaking of the adulteration of beer, he did not for one moment bring a charge against the great brewers. He believed that the evidence cleared them entirely from all suspicion of adulteration, but this could not be said of the public-houses. Not only did the gentlemen to whom he had alluded speak unanimously of the way in which beer was adulterated, but there was one practical witness who asserted from his own daily knowledge that such was the fact. The only labourer who was examined gave his evidence in these terms. He was asked—"Can a man do hard work on publican's beer?" and his reply was "No." "What effect has it?" he was next asked, and he answered—"The beer is so bad that he cannot work." "It gets into his head?" Answer—"Yes." It makes him feel so bad?" Answer—"Yes; it makes a man feel too bad to do hard work. He always wants to be drinking." Now, there was one fact which established beyond doubt that this man's evidence was truthful—

namely, the fact that the importation of cocculus Indicus had largely increased within the last few years. Cocculus Indicus was a narcotic of an intoxicating and stupefying character, and, as far as he was aware, was only used in this country for two purposes, the poisoning of fish and the poisoning of men. He found that in 1857 the quantity of the drug consumed in this country was only 68 cwt., but in 1858 it had increased to 394 cwt.: while in the years 1867 and 1868 the quantities consumed were respectively 689 cwt. and 1,064 cwt. The drug was thus extensively used notwithstanding the fact that the very heavy duty of 5s. per cwt. was levied upon it. No wonder, then, that the statement made by the poor man before the Committee was perfectly true with regard to many labourers in the country. No wonder that he complained that they could not do their work, and that they always wanted to be drinking. We often heard of labourers being knocked down with sunstroke during the hot season, but we ought not to be greatly surprised at this if we remembered that an enormous quantity of cocculus Indicus was imported into this country and that this subtle poison entered into their daily drink. Then there was another article which he believed was very considerably adulterated, and it was one which our seafaring population were especially interested in obtaining in a pure state. It was only the other day that he read a newspaper paragraph which stated that in Liverpool it was quite impossible to procure limejuice of sufficient purity to meet the requirements of the Board of Trade. Of course, he could not vouch for the truth of the statement, but if it were true, such a fact certainly did not tell well for our commercial morality. He thought he had sufficiently proved that the law required amendment of some sort. In his opinion a penalty of £5 and costs was much too insignificant to prevent the recurrence of this class of offences, and the law was likewise defective because it did not provide for a proper supervision and inspection with regard to weights and measures as well as the adulteration of food. Should a Bill on this subject be introduced, it would be well to consider what was the practice in foreign countries with respect to these matters. He found that in almost every civilized country the provisions of the law were far more stringent than with us. In France, for example, all frauds of this kind were under the supervision of the police. A commissary of police had a right to enter premises and seize any suspected goods he might find, bearing all the responsibility, of course, if the seizure were a wrongful one. Then the inspectors, both of weights and measures, and of food, were not, as with us, retired tradesmen, but were appointed by a central authority—the Minister and Prefect. With regard to drugs, there was a special body, called Inspecteurs de Pharmacie, and the tribunals had the power to punish offenders with fine and imprisonment, to advertise the names of delinquents, and to order the adulterated goods either to be destroyed before the owners' doors or to be confiscated for charitable purposes. The law of Prussia was still more stringent. Whoever knowingly used false weights and measures in that country was liable to imprisonment for three months, to be fined from fifty to 1,000 thalers, and to suffer the temporary loss of his rights of citizenship. Secondly, where false weights and measures were not regularly employed, a fine of thirty thalers might be imposed, or the delinquent sent to prison for four weeks. Thirdly, the adulteration of food or drink was punishable with a fine of 150 thalers, or six weeks' imprisonment. Fourthly, if poisonous matter or stuff were employed, the offender was liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years. Fifthly, where adulteration was proved to have caused severe physical injury, a sentence of from ten to twenty years' imprisonment might be passed. And yet in this country offences of this nature could only be punished by the imposition of a penalty of £5 with costs. It might, however, be asked why he, who had gone so deeply into the subject, and had pointed out the defects of the existing law, did not try his hand at amending it in the best way he could? His reply was, that questions of this kind could be much better dealt with by Government. For his own part, he was very much opposed, as a rule, to private Members bringing in measures of a national character. Now, this subject was one which, in his judgment, ought to have been looked into and legislated upon long ago. He had hoped that the late Government would have taken it up, but they had too much of other work on their hands. Besides, they had not the power, if they had the will, to do justice to it, on account of the powerful Opposition arrayed against them. He might, indeed, say that the late Government only existed on sufferance. This, however, was far from being the case with the Government now in Office, who, being backed up by a majority of over 100, had the power, and, if report spoke truly, the will also, to deal with this question in a satisfactory manner. He sincerely trusted, however, that the Government would not appoint either a Committee or a Royal Commission to investigate the subject, for in nine cases out of ten the labours of Commissions and Committees led to the shelving of the questions which they were appointed to consider. Of information regarding this matter, and, he might add, of delay also the country had had quite enough. What was required was action, immediate action; and the Minister who should deal with the subject quickly, thoroughly, and comprehensively would entitle himself to the gratitude of the whole community, and would go down to posterity as one of the greatest benefactors to the labouring classes.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that Her Majesty's Government should give their earliest attention to the widespread and most reprehensible practices of using False Weights and Measures and of adulterating Food, Drink, and Drugs, with the view of amending the Law as regards the penalties now inflicted for those offences, and of providing more efficient means for the discovery and prevention of fraud,"—

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, it was clearly shown by the evidence which had been taken before the Committee to which the noble Lord (Lord Eustace Cecil) had particularly referred, that the chief cause of adulteration was the legislation which had rendered the food and drink consumed by the working classes artificially dear. Let that cause be removed, and the evil itself would, to a great extent, cease to exist. Among the witnesses who spoke to this effect before the Committee were Professor Taylor, Mr. Gray, and Professor Calvert, of Manchester. He very well recollected the eloquent terms in which the First Lord of the Treasury in 1861 dwelt upon the expediency of reducing the duty on wine, so that the temptation to adulterate it might be taken away, and the same argument applied, in his opinion, with equal force to such articles as tea, sugar, and coffee. It was extraordinary, he might add, to what an extent the adulteration of whisky in Ireland had increased since an additional duty had been imposed upon it by the right hon. Gentleman. The quantity sold had diminished, but then the consumption of it was now in many instances accompanied by delirium tremens, verging sometimes on insanity to an extent which never previously existed. The way to put an end to the evil which led to such results was not by the agency of the police, but by doing away with the temptation which was the real cause of its prevalence. The Government which should accomplish that object would, he quite agreed with the noble Lord, be great benefactors of their country.

MR. POCHIN said, he thought the noble Lord had done good service by directing the attention of the House to the subject, though he (Mr. Pochin) was of opinion, that the reason why there had not been more prosecutions under the Act of the 23 & 24 Vict. for the prevention of adulteration was, that adulteration was not so general as the House and the country had imagined. Adulteration might be divided into two classes; first, that which simply reduced the commercial value of the article sold to the public; secondly, that which was calculated to interfere prejudicially with the general health of the community. Under the first head he was of opinion that a very serious amount of adulteration existed, and the attention of the Government had very properly been called to it; but he doubted very much whether the statement of the noble Lord was correct so far as adulteration affecting the general health of the people was concerned. His own impression was—and it was the result of much careful investigation of the subject—that the articles of food which were adulterated in such a manner as to affect to any material degree the public health, were exceedingly restricted in number, and a thorough examination of the evidence which had been taken on the point would, he ventured to say, establish the soundness of that view. The greatest service which had been done the country in connection with the subject, was that which had been rendered by the Analytical Commission which prosecuted its labours some fourteen or fifteen years ago, under the able direction of Dr. Hassall, the result of whose investigations had been published in The Lancet. The result of the inquiry went to prove that while the articles which were adulterated were very numerous—there being scarcely any article of commerce which was not adulterated—yet adulteration tending to injure the health of the community was extremely limited. He believed indeed he was right in saying, that the list of articles which had been found to be adulterated to an extent deeply injurious to health, was pretty nearly confined to pickles, sweetmeats, and Cayenne pepper. It had indeed been discovered that there was scarcely a single sample of arrowroot which was not extensively adulterated; but then it was adulterated with inferior and less expensive varieties of farina, injurious rather to the pocket than to the health of the consumer. He had another reason for believing that the conclusions at which he had arrived in the matter were correct. Soon after the passing of the Act 23 & 24 Vict., the Act was taken into consideration by a very energetic Committee, who conducted its labours in Manchester, connected with the Sanitary Association, and whose members were of opinion that adulteration injurious to health very largely prevailed. They accordingly persuaded six of the most eminent chemists in Manchester to examine articles collected from all parts of the town, and to report upon them. He held in his hand the Report which was drawn up as the result of that investigation by Dr. Angus Smith, who he understood held some official position under the Government, and than whom a more able man as the head of such an inquiry could not be found. The conclusion arrived at by the Committee was, that out of eighty substances which had been procured from shops in which the labouring classes dealt extensively, none were adulterated in a way deeply to affect the public health; and he was happy to be able to add that the evil of adulteration, instead of being constantly on the increase, was rather shown to be diminishing, by the evidence furnished by recent investigations. He did not, however, mean to contend that the question was not one in which the Government might very well take action. Nothing was more objectionable than that there should be any mistake with respect to it out-of-doors, and he could very well imagine, that if the statement of the noble Lord were to go forth to the public unquestioned, that articles of food and drink were so adulterated as to be deeply injurious to health, the shock to the nervous system of a large portion of the community would be far more prejudicial than any actual amount of adulteration which now exists. What the House wanted were the real facts of the case, and the Government had it in their power to supply these at a comparatively small outlay. He agreed with the noble Lord, that it would be useless to appoint a Committee or a Commission, before which anybody who had a bee in his bonnet on this subject might exhibit the bee, as had been done in the case of the last Committee. He thought the proper action of the Government would be to follow the course prescribed by the late Mr. Wakley, by placing the matter in the hands of one or two official analysts, such as Mr. Phillips, of Somerset House, and Dr. Angus Smith, and he felt satisfied that if those gentlemen associated with themselves a microscopist, they would give to the country the exact state of the case. Parliament would then legislate with much greater certainty and confidence than it could at present. Two kinds of adulteration had been specially named—the mixing of alum in bread and cocculus Indicus in beer. Now he was not going to dispute the poisonous nature of cocculus Indicus, but no one had yet shown that the effects produced on the system by intoxication from cocculus Indicus were more injurious than intoxication from spirit. As to the presence of alum in bread, the general opinion on this point was quite at variance with that of the most able chemists. Professor Liebig had acknowledged that the ordinary mixture of alum in bread as practised in this country was not injurious, but positively beneficial. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed, and he should like to convince them by going into the question somewhat technically. In general terms, however, he might say that flour contained a quantity of gluten, which very readily passed into a state of decomposition and decay. The presence of a small quantity of alum arrested that decay, and enabled the baker to produce by the use of seconds flour a very much superior bread than would otherwise be possible. The substitute which Liebig recommended the baker to use in such cases was caustic lime. Hon. Members might take their choice between the addition of alum and caustic lime; for his part he preferred the alum, and he thought that would be the general judgment of the community. He had said that the general health was not extensively interfered with by adulteration; but adulteration was practised so as to amount to a fraud upon the community. It was, therefore, rather on the ground of injury to the pocket, than of injury to health, that he joined the noble Lord in urging the Government, to give their immediate attention to this very important subject.

MR. BRIGHT: The noble Lord (Lord Eustace Cecil) has taken great pains upon this question, and has brought before the House a great amount of detail in connection with it. As I listened to his observations I hoped and believed that there was, though it was entirely unintentional, no little exaggeration in them. Although there may be particular cases in which great harm to health and great fraud may possibly be shown, yet I think that general statements of this kind, implicating to a large extent the traders of this country, are dangerous and are almost certain to be unjust. Now, my hon Friend, the Member for Stafford (Mr. Pochin), who has just addressed the House in a speech showing his entire mastery of the question, has confirmed my opinion, for he has shown—and I dare say he knows as much of the matter as any Gentleman present—that there is a great deal of exaggeration in the opinions which have prevailed in many parts of the country, and which have even been found to prevail upon the matter in this House. The proposition of the noble Lord is—"That it is expedient that Her Majesty's Government should give their earliest attention to the widespread and most reprehensible practices of using False Weights and Measures and of Adulterating Food, Drink, and Drugs."

and so on. Now, I am prepared to show that the exaggeration of the noble Lord—I do not say intentionally, of course; I am sure he is incapable of that—is just as great in the matter of weights and measures as in that of adulteration. Probably he is not aware that in the list of persons employing weights that are inaccurate—I do not say fraudulent—no distinction is drawn between those who are intentionally fraudulent and those who are accidentally inaccurate, and that the penalty is precisely the same, and the offence is just as eagerly detected, whether there be a fraud or merely an accident. Now the noble Lord will probably be surprised when I tell him that many persons are fined annually, not because their weights are too small, but because they are too large. In fact, when the weights are inaccurate but are in favour of the customer, still the owner and user of the weight is liable to the penalty and is fined. I have here a statement made by the Secretary of the Standards Commission, to which this matter has been referred, and he says—

"During recent years many Returns have been laid before Parliament of convictions for false and unjust weights and measures, more especially in the metropolitan district, and a close examination of these Returns will show very few convictions for fraudulent weights and measures. The great majority are for defective or unjust weights and measures, deviating more or less from the standard, many of these deviations being of comparatively trifling amount, and frequently in favour of the purchaser—that is to say, the weights are too heavy and the measures too large. The convictions for unjust balances are also, for the most part, for defective, not for fraudulent balances."

That is a statement, coming from undoubted authority, which may, I think, relieve our countrymen connected with trade from the stigma attaching to them that there exists a general or widespread system of using inaccurate and fraudulent balances. An Act on this subject was passed in 1835, and penalties were inflicted as I have said. The noble Lord is against any more Commissions or Committees, and I do not ask for them for a moment, but a Commission is now engaged in inquiring into this very subject. It was appointed with a view to a revision of the standards, because, while fining shopkeepers for the use of inaccurate weights, it was found in a great many cases that the standards themselves were inaccurate, and for a tradesman to be fined because he did not keep his weight by an inaccurate standard seems to be rather a stretch of power. This Commission is now sitting; they have extended their inquiry to this very Act to which the noble Lord alluded. In four or five months their Report will be made, and there is an expression of opinion on the part of the Secretary that the whole of the laws connected with weights and measures appear to require revision, and that a comprehensive measure is required for amending and consolidating those laws. The Report of the Commission will not be issued for some time, and as Parliament has on its hands, probably, quite as much as it can do in the present Session, I do not think that any legislation will be possible this year. Now I come to the question of adulteration. My late lamented Friend and Colleague, Mr. Scholefield, brought in a Bill in 1860 or 1861. He was much urged to do this by very enthusiastic constituents of his who took a prodigious interest in the matter. I have not the Act before me, and I do not know exactly how far its provisions extend; but it gave corporations and magistrates power to appoint analysts who should take care to examine into adulterations, and penalties were to be inflicted under the Act. If the corporations and the magistrates have not sufficient interest in the matter; if the people who elect the corporations care so little about it, I think that is fair evidence that the grievance is not near so extensive and injurious and burdensome as it has been described by the noble Lord. My own impression with regard to this adulteration is that it arises from the very great, and, perhaps, inevitable competition in business; and that to a large extent it is promoted by the ignorance of customers. As the ignorance of customers generally is diminishing, we may hope that before long the adulteration of food may also diminish. The noble Lord appears to ask that something much more extensive and stringent should be done by Parliament. The fact is, it is vain to attempt by the power of Parliament to penetrate into and to track out evils such as these on which the noble Lord has dwelt at such length. It is quite impossible that you should have the oversight of the shops of the country by inspectors, and that you can organize a body of persons to go into shops to buy sugar, pickles, and Cayenne pepper, to get them analyzed, and then to raise complaints against shopkeepers and bring them before the magistrates. If men in their private businesses were to be tracked by Government officers and inspectors every hour of the day, life would not be worth having, and I should recommend them to remove to another country, where they would not be subject to such annoyance. The question, too, as the noble Lord has put it, is one of great difficulty, because, if the Government proposed to legislate on the whole of this matter, I suspect it would be found that, in the clauses of a Bill, however carefully it might be drawn, there would be points that would create so much difference that it would be impossible to settle them. It was the case, I know, when my late Colleague brought forward his Bill, and it was found almost impossible to pass it through the House. If any hon. Member chooses to go into this question before the Government can touch it, and to suggest a measure which he may think will be likely to give satisfaction, the Government will be perfectly ready to examine it, and give it fair consideration. I regard these subjects as about the most difficult, and, at the same time, I think, about the least advantageous to which Parliament can devote itself. Most of the Bills of this kind which have been passed during the twenty-five years I have been in Parliament have failed in their operation, and I suspect that most of the attempts which will be made hereafter will be equally unsuccessful. The question of weights and measures is a different one; it is simple; you can reduce it to an accurate standard; and Parliament can accomplish something. The Report of the Commission will soon be made; and it is, I believe, the intention of the Government, as it would be my own disposition, when it is made, to take such steps as may appear best, with a view to asking Parliament for fresh legislation on this subject. I shall be glad if, after this answer and explanation, the noble Lord may not deem it necessary to press the Motion which he has placed on the Notice Paper.

MR. BENTINCK said, the House and the country ought to feel obliged to the noble Lord (Lord Eustace Cecil) for the way in which he had brought the question forward; but he did not regard the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade as satisfactory. Every householder must have felt extreme difficulty in obtaining articles of food that were not more or less adulterated; and, however much the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Pochin) might be master of the subject, all the speeches he might deliver would not convince the House that bread without alum was not more wholesome than bread that contained it. But when the right hon. Gentleman spoke of tradesmen going abroad to avoid inspectors, he should remember that in France, and other countries, every baker and every vendor was under the strict and watchful eye of the police; and that a baker in France dare no more sell adulterated bread than commit an offence against the criminal law. The result was, that on leaving behind the alum loaf at an English port you got excellent bread at the first port or station you stopped at in France. Again, from the north to the south of Italy, as the Prime Minister would know, you would find no bread adulterated or food tampered with. If the Government would inquire into the practice of foreign countries as regards the inspection of food, they would learn a useful lesson which might be applied in this country at a future time with great benefit. In attributing adulteration to Customs duties, the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart) no doubt alluded to tea, coffee, and sugar, but he forgot that that argument did not apply to bread nor to flour, which was as extensively adulterated as anything in this country. The other day, visiting a family in London, who were having bread made, he inquired and found that the flour was obtained at a distance because it was impossible to get it pure in the neighbourhood. The taking of the duty off wine had not lessened the adulteration of that article, and no man had more sins on his back than the Prime Minister had for taking off the duty. Its removal offered a premium to foreigners to send to this country every kind of poisonous mixture. As to weights and measures, why not bring in a measure to discriminate between fraud and unintentional error? Nothing was so unsatisfactory as the arbitrary power vested in the magistrates. In the county of Cumberland an eminent tradesman, who had one large establishment and many shops in different districts, was discovered to be using weights and measures that were, not colourably, but actually, false, and when this eminent tradesman—who dealt among other things in so-called Liberal politics—was before the magistrates, and the case was proved, they said that really this tradesman was such a very respectable man it was quite impossible he could have known what he was doing, and they did not fine him. The protection of the public required that every individual who had false weights should be severely punished; and it would be well if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would consider the expediency of adopting a mild measure of punishment resorted to in France—that of compelling the convicted tradesman to provide a placard setting forth his guilt, and to exhibit it prominently in his place of business. In the hope that the Government would pay early attention to the subject, and bring forward a measure upon it, he should advise his noble Friend to withdraw the Motion.

MR. PEEK, as one whose business for thirty years past had been in the colonial markets, which covered the principal articles of the breakfast table, had no hesitation in saying that, the country through, fully a hundred tons of tea as imported were retailed, to every pound adulterated here. In some minor articles a good deal of adulteration, no doubt, went on; but the motive was extra profit, and very few of the adulterating materials were injurious to health. With regard to the punishment of persons using false weights and measures, he believed it would be unwise to increase the penalties, and both unjust and cruel to make, as had been suggested, the punishment imprisonment—the clerks to the magistrates, both of Middlesex and Surrey, agreeing that in fully 80 per cent of the cases brought before them, the inaccuracy arose from carelessness rather than design. That morning above 200 licenses had been brought before his petty sessional bench; of the very few complaints made throughout the expired year, only one was of at all a serious a character.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the increased number of Railway Accidents during the last few months, arising from the enormous traffic now carried on by the principal lines? He divided accidents on railways into two classes—those which arose from circumstances in some measure under control, and those which occurred in defiance of reasonable supervision. At present it happened that when a fatal railway accident occurred it excited public attention but for a few days, a jury inquired into the circumstances which led to the deaths, sometimes their deliberations ended with a simple verdict, and at the most one or two of the company's servants were committed on a charge of manslaughter. He maintained, however, that accidents were, in most cases, the fault of the system and not of the servants; the lines were gorged with traffic to such an extent that the delay of a minute, in some instances, would lead to the most deplorable results. He had noticed more than four-and-twenty accidents had occurred during the last four months, nineteen of which were collisions of trains, and eight of these had been marked by gross carelessness. But, as the House would, perhaps, prefer the statistics of a Government Department to those collected by an individual, he gave a digest of the Board of Trade Returns of Accidents during the last four years. From these, it appeared that the collisions far exceeded accidents of other descriptions, and that the percentage of personal injuries was larger in the case of collisions. During 1864, 88 accidents of all kinds occurred; 59 of them were collisions, and 29 other accidents. The passengers killed and injured in the collisions numbered 642, and in the other accidents 142. In 1865, there were 112 accidents, of which 69 were collisions, and 43 others; the killed and injured in consequence of the collisions numbered 838, and in the other cases 267. In 1866, there were 75 accidents, 53 collisions, and 22 from other causes; the killed and injured in the one case were 498, and in the other 114. In 1867, which was the last year dealt with by the Returns as yet, 106 accidents occurred, 65 through collisions, and 41 from other causes; the killed and injured in the one case were 571, and in the other 221. These were remarkable facts; they showed that collisions were not only more frequent than all other kinds of accidents put together, but that they were also more fruitful of personal injury. The four years showed a total of 246 collisions, as against 135 other accidents; the killed and injured from the collisions numbered 2,549, and from accidents through other causes 744, giving a proportion of 10½ persons injured by each collision against 5½ by each accident from other causes. He trusted the Government would study these statistics, and see what could be done to remedy the defects in our railway system, of which they were the result. In conclusion, he asked whether it is the intention of the Government to do anything with a view to regulate such traffic, so as to give greater security to passengers; and, if not, whether they would grant a Select Committee to inquire as to the best method of regulating such traffic, either by the establishment of a separate line for the conveyance of goods, or by a compulsory system of telegraphic signals?

ACCIDENTS IN THE CARDIFF DOCKS. OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. CANDLISH called the attention of the House to the great loss of life by drowning in the Bute Docks at Cardiff. Though the Notice which he had put on the Paper was limited to the Bute Docks, the facts he had to bring forward applied to the whole of Cardiff harbour. From 1862 to 1868, both inclusive, no fewer than 208 human beings had lost their lives by drowning at Cardiff, which was nearly at the rate of 30 a year. In 1862, 21 persons were drowned; in 1863, 24; in 1864, 30; in 1865, 32; in 1866, 37; in 1867, 34; and in 1868, 30; making a total of 208. In some years every month had its human sacrifices. He would ask was there anything special in Cardiff from which this loss of life must necessarily result? He was informed that there was nothing like it even in London or Liverpool. One of the causes he was told was that there were no railings or chains by the water's edge, and again and again people walked over into the water. Another cause was that in one of the docks there was not a single light; in another the lighting was very imperfect, and in both there was want of watching. Again, the coals shipped there gave off a light kind of dust which lay alike on the water and the ground, and the consequence was that people mistook the one for the other. The question was whether this loss of life was preventible. He did not suppose that any precaution which could be adopted would prevent the loss of some lives wherever there was work and water, but he believed there was a preventible loss here, and that either the Government or the House, which had given power to construct these docks, ought to see that proper arrangements were made for the preservation of life. Many of the accidents, he was told, might be prevented by means of a moveable chain, which could be taken away when men were at their work, and by better lighting; but it was for the parties concerned to devise the necessary preventives.

COLONEL STUART said, he was not prepared to admit, especially upon the very short notice which his hon. Friend had given, the accuracy of the statistics which he had quoted. He could assure the House that the managers of the docks were quite alive to their responsibility, and would be glad to take every possible precaution, for they had always exerted themselves to the utmost to prevent those calamitous accidents which were almost unavoidable in the case of docks. Believing that the hon. Member's Notice referred only to the Bute Docks, he had not made any inquiry as to the other docks, but he found that in 1867 the deaths by accident in the Bute Docks were only twenty-one, of which five took place by day, and three or four were "females" and supposed to be suicides; and as about 60,000 sailors entered the docks in that year, that was an average of about one casualty to 5,000 sailors. In 1868 the average was greater. In consequence of some extensive works which were going on, the number of sailors that entered was only 54,000, but the casualties were as one to every 3,200 sailors. He could assure the House that the proprietors of the Cardiff Docks would be most happy if the Board of Trade would assist them in carrying out measures for the greater preservation of life in future.

MR. BRIGHT: The Question that has been put to me by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) I take to belong rather to the Home Office, and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will probably answer it by-and-by. The hon. Gentleman who has brought forward the question of railway accidents appears to me to have based his Question and his proposition on a very insecure foundation, because he asks me whether my attention has been called to the increased number of railway accidents during the last few months, arising from the enormous traffic now carried on by the principal lines. Now, so far as the figures which are before the Board of Trade prove, there has been no increase in railway accidents; and, in fact, if we consider the constant increase in the amount of mileage, and the number of trains run, and of passengers carried, it is quite clear that the accidents have steadily diminished. Now, these are the figures which will perhaps interest the hon. Gentleman—The number of accidents—I do not speak now of injuries to person or loss of life—was, in 1864, 78; in 1865, 92; in 1866, 69; in 1867, 95; and in 1868, 87. These are accidents that were more or less considerable, and the number, though it varies to some extent, does not show anything like the increase to which the hon. Gentleman has called the attention of the House. Well, the passengers killed in 1864 were 14; in 1865, 22; in 1866, 15; and in 1867, 19. Then we come to the extraordinary accident at Abergele of which, I believe the hon. Gentleman himself was a witness, in which thirty-one persons lost their lives, and yet the whole number of passengers killed in 1868 was forty, so that, deducting that accident, the whole number of lives lost during the year besides was only nine. An accident of the kind that occurred at Abergele, grievous and horrible as it is, should not be taken into consideration in looking at the figures and the averages. The number of persons injured stands thus—in 1864, 697; in 1865, 1,034; in 1866, 540; in 1867, 689; and in 1868, 519. Therefore, the number of persons injured in railway trains in 1868 was lower than in any of the previous four years, and that notwithstanding the increase of carriage and trains, and the enormous increase constantly occurring in the mileage and number of persons travelling. That loss of life, I ought to state, does not include the servants of the companies, nor does it include trespassers, it includes merely passengers who have been killed by circumstances over which they had no control, and, as it may be said, either by accident or the fault of the companies. The House will see, if I next give them some figures as to the increase of passengers, how much better this account shows than it does as I have read it. In 1857 the number of passengers carried (exclusive of season tickets) was in round numbers 139,000,000; in 1864 it was 229,000,000; in 1865, 251,000,000; in 1866, 274,000,000; and in 1867, 287,000,000. The Return for the last year has not yet been furnished. But, notwithstanding that enormous increase in the number of persons carried, the number who lost their lives is almost stationary; while the number injured has really fallen off. Therefore, looking at the whole case, there is nothing to create alarm in regard to this question. The hon. Gentleman asks whether the Government will do anything more to regulate this traffic, and give greater security to passengers? I think I have shown that there is no diminution of security so far as the figures go; and the hon. Member must know that there has been almost any amount of legislation heretofore with the view of in some way or other giving the Board of Trade power to interfere with the railway companies. My own impression—and it is also the impression of the most skilled and most experienced gentlemen in the Department with which I am connected—is that it would be a very perilous thing, and one not good for the public, to add continually to this interference with railways on the part of the Board of Trade, because you take from them some of the responsibility which ought to attach to them; and you ask me, or those who are assisting me in that Department, to regulate that which no man in it can know one-hundredth part as much about as the actual managers and directors of these railways. But then there comes this other question—What are the inducements which the companies now have to afford security to their passengers and prevent accidents? I will give the House two or three figures that are to me most astonishing, although I had before an opinion that the inducements for the good management of their lines were very great on the part of the companies. By the force of law passengers who are injured on railways, and the friends of those who are killed, can claim compensation from the companies on whose lines the accidents by which they suffered have happened. Now, in the year 1865, the compensation paid for these personal injuries alone amounted to more than £333,000, while the amount paid for damage done to goods in the same year was £115,000. In 1866, the sum paid as compensation for personal injuries was £306,000, and for damage to goods £178,000. In 1867, the compensation for personal injuries was £347,000, and the amount paid for damages to goods £166,000. Thus the total amount of compensation paid in each year was—in 1865, £449,000; in 1866, £484,000; and in 1867, £513,000. The Returns for 1868 are not yet furnished, and therefore I am unable to give them to the House. Let the House bear in mind that there is this enormous expense to the companies of more than £500,000 annually, which is equal to a capital sum of from £10,000,000 to £15,000,000. In addition to that there are law expenses to a very large amount. I ask, then, is it possible for Parliament to pass any law which shall add to the force of this great argument acting on railway directors and managers with the view to induce them to give the greatest possible security to the passengers and goods travelling on their lines? The London and North Western Company paid in 1867 not less than £86,000 for personal injuries alone. And, without wishing to give any additional authority to my opinion on account of the office which I hold—for I am now only expressing the opinion I have entertained for years past—I venture to say that the law itself as it stands, without limit of compensation, is a law of very questionable character; and I think, further, that neither the Press, nor juries, nor the public are disposed to give the credit which is due to the managers of the great lines of railway in this kingdom. My own belief is that, owing so much as we do to them, and considering their vast expenditure of capital, with the service they render to the public, we might, on many occasions, take a fairer view of the conduct and the success of railway management than we are accustomed to do in this country. The hon. Member asked, further, whether the Government would not grant a Select Committee—

“To inquire as to the best method of regulating such traffic, either by the establishment of a separate line for the conveyance of goods, or by a compulsory system of telegraphic signals?”

I think the hon. Member can hardly suppose that it would be possible for a Committee to recommend, or for Parliament to insist on, the formation of separate lines for the conveyance of goods. As the lines become more and more crowded, in some circumstances it is possible that recourse may be had to other lines. The London and North Western Company have, for some miles, another line out of London; and that example may, perhaps, be followed elsewhere. But when you consider the difficulty which many of these companies are now under in regard to capital, I think it would be throwing away the time and labour of a Committee to ask it to investigate a question like that. (With respect to a compulsory system of telegraphic signals, these signals are, I think, universal on the lines; they are, as far as I understand, very complete; and if the Board of Trade or any Act of Parliament were to interfere with a matter so delicate and minute in the management and arrangements of railways as that, I think that in all probability it would do ten times more harm than good. I hope, then, that the statement I have made may not only be deemed a sufficient answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, but may do something to allay the fears which have been created among those who have not examined the facts, and which no doubt give a shock to the nerves of many persons who travel by railway. For myself, I agree very much with those connected with railways when they say that there is no place in which a man can put himself where he can remain so long and go so far without taking any harm as in a first-class railway carriage.)

MR. BRUCE: In answer to the appeal of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish), I think I need hardly assure him that the Home Office has no power of direct interference in cases such as that which he has brought under the notice of the House. I have no doubt that the facts he has mentioned will cause the attention of the local authorities of Cardiff and of the proprietors of the Bute Docks to be directed to the many accidents which happen there, whether they are or are not as numerous as he has stated. But under the circumstances it will be my duty to communicate with the local authorities, and to call their attention to the facts to which the hon. Gentleman has referred; and I hope the result will be that steps will be taken for affording security to human life in these docks.

IRELAND—APPOINTMENT OF SIR E. R. WETHERALL.—QUESTION.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland the Question of which he had given notice respecting the appointment of the late Government, on the eve of their resignation, of Colonel Sir E. R. Wetherall as Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. and gallant Member said, he did not find fault with the late Government for accepting the resignation of Sir Thomas Larcom, but with the mode in which they had appointed his successor. He took exception to that appointment, first, because it had been made permanent, and next, because it was held by a military man—a system being thereby introduced into Ireland quite the opposite of that which prevailed in England and Scotland. Probably his right hon Friend had made inquiries into the subject since notice of his Question had been given, and would be able to inform them how, when, and for what reason that appointment was made permanent. For a period of eighteen years, or from 1835 to 1853, he found that under the successive Administrations which held Office in this country the appointment of Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was, like that of the Lord Lieutenant, a political office, which changed its occupant with the change of Government itself, and it was not until after that date that it became permanent. In 1835, when Lord Melbourne was Prime Minister, Lord Normanby was Lord Lieutenant, and Mr. Drummond was Under Secretary, and on his death in 1840 he was succeeded by Mr. Norman M'Donald. In 1841 Sir Robert Peel appointed Lord De Grey Lord Lieutenant, and Mr. Edward Lucas Under Secretary, and before Sir Robert Peel left Office Mr. Pennefather held the Under Secretaryship for a year. In 1846, when

Lord John Russell was Prime Minister, Lord Bessborough was appointed Lord Lieutenant, and Sir Thomas Redington the Under Secretary. In 1852 Lord Derby appointed the Earl of Eglinton Lord Lieutenant, and Mr. Wynne Under Secretary; and the Earl of Aberdeen, in June, 1853, appointed the Earl of St. Germans Lord Lieutenant, and Colonel Larcom Under Secretary. It was considered in 1835 that it would be advantageous for the country if the office were made a political one, and that the person filling it should be in unison with the Government of the day. The objection to the appointment being made permanent was one of long standing among many of the Gentlemen who represented Irish constituencies; indeed, he might say that almost all the Irish Members entertained a very strong opinion on the subject. The present Government did not wish to treat Ireland differently from the rest of the United Kingdom, and he hoped that they would state why a course which was in accordance with constitutional usage, and which had proved very beneficial, had been departed from. He also objected to the office being conferred upon a soldier. Sir Edward Wetherall was, no doubt, a most meritorious man, but the training he had gone through was not of the kind required for an Under Secretary for Ireland. He had distinguished himself as a soldier in Canada, India, the Crimea, and elsewhere, and in 1868 he was taken from the Horse Guards and appointed to the Under Secretaryship. He (Colonel Greville-Nugent) did not deny that Sir Edward Wetherall deserved to be rewarded for his important professional services, but that was a matter that ought to have been left to the Horse Guards. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Colonel Wilson-Patten) might, perhaps, allege that in appointing a soldier to the office he did not depart from the established custom. It was no doubt true that Sir Thomas Larcom was a soldier, but he was an officer of the Engineers, which was a different service from the rest of the army, and, besides, he was employed by the Board of Works in Dublin and on the survey of Ireland for a great number of years before he was made Under Secretary. There was no parallel, therefore, between the appointment of Sir Thomas Larcom and that of Sir Edward Wetherall. The appointment of Mr. Drummond could not be referred to in justification of the late appointment, because Mr. Drummond had been engaged on the survey in Ireland, and had been long acquainted with the country and the people, and had more of their confidence than any other man that had filled the office. If the Lord Lieutenant required to consult a soldier there was the Commander of the Forces, who was perfectly competent to regulate all the military part of the business. An account of the duties of the office of Under Secretary was given in a recently published life of Mr. Drummond, from which it appeared that his functions were exceedingly diversified. For instance, he had to receive and reply to a variety of communications similar to those which were addressed to the Home Office in England. He also had to receive constabulary reports, and to carry on an extensive daily correspondence with the local and stipendiary magistrates, to bring under the notice of the Lord Lieutenant all matters of an important nature, and to communicate with the Chief Secretary and other officers of Government. In addition, he was, during the absence of the Viceroy and of the Chief Secretary, virtually the Irish Government. If it was intended to govern Ireland in future as it had been governed in the past, by all means let a soldier be Under Secretary — let the country, in fact, be kept under martial law; but if they looked to governing Ireland as a constituent part of the United Kingdom, let the great offices in its Government be placed in the hands of civilians changing with the Government of the day; and the sooner they made this office political the better. In conclusion, the hon. and gallant Gentleman asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If Colonel Sir E. R. Wetherall, appointed by the late Government on the eve of their resignation as Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, is the same person whose name appears as Deputy Quartermaster General at the Horse Guards; if the appointment is permanent; and, whether the present Government considers it desirable that the whole Civil Administration of Ireland should be under the control of a Military man, holding his appointment independently of the Government of the day, instead of a civilian, according to the custom which

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Longford (Colonel Greville-Nugent) has thought it his duty to bring before the House the question of the appointment of Sir Edward Wetherall to a very high and important office in the Irish Government. Now, I think the best thing I can do is to endeavour to give an accurate statement of what happened in regard to this matter—a statement which, if it be inaccurate in any respect, will, no doubt, be corrected by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson-Patten). For some time the late Under Secretary for Ireland, Sir Thomas Larcom, had been most anxious to resign the arduous office which he had filled for so many years with so much benefit to the public service. He had, on several occasions, offered his resignation to the Earl of Mayo, and had more than once been persuaded, he believed, by his Lordship, to continue to assist him during his tenure of the Irish Office, especially under the grave circumstances connected with the Fenian disturbances with which Lord Mayo had to deal. Lord Mayo afterwards went to India, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire succeeded him as Chief Secretary. Sir Thomas Larcom then renewed his application for what I may term a release from his laborious duties at the the Irish Office, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire very naturally protested against being deserted at such a time in an office which was new to him by a gentleman of such immense experience. Sir Thomas Larcom accordingly consented to continue in office for some weeks longer. Upon receiving positive information of Sir Thomas Larcom's determination to resign his office, the late Government proceeded to take measures to find a successor; and the result was the choice of Sir Edward Wetherall, a distinguished soldier, then filling an important office in the Horse Guards, where, I must say, the late Government might, in my opinion, have far more wisely left him, with great advantage to the military service of this country. Well, the result of the inquiries of the Government was to place Sir Edward Wetherall in the Irish Office.

Colonel Greville-Nugent

The letter appointing him is dated the 18th of November, 1868, and he was gazetted on the 1st of the following month. I sincerely believe that that choice was made by the late Government with the best possible intentions. They did, I believe, endeavour to find the best person whose services they could procure to fill the important office which was vacant, and I am far from imputing to them any such impropriety as that of creating a vacancy merely for the purpose of obtaining the patronage connected with the appointment. More than that, I am bound to tell my hon. and gallant Friend and the House that the late Government were perfectly entitled to look upon this office as a permanent one, inasmuch as it had been placed on that footing for some years. I hold in my hand a Paper which has been already moved for, and which will show my hon. and gallant Friend and the House how the change in it was made. The fact is that this office, which until the year 1834 or 1835 was a permanent office, was in that year accepted by a man to whom my hon. and gallant Friend has paid so just a tribute—Mr. Drummond, and converted into a political appointment, which it continued to be until January, 1854. At that time a correspondence passed between the Treasury and Sir John Young, who was Chief Secretary for Ireland, in which Sir John Young gave reasons to show the Government that it was desirable to restore the office to its former permanent character, Sir John Young writes—

“It is only of late years, since 1834, that the practice has grown up of considering this office political, and to be filled up by a gentleman attached to the party in power. There is nothing in the duties assigned to the office which invests it with this character; on the contrary, it is of moment that the business chiefly connected with the local administration of justice, the supervision of the constabulary, and the regular routine of the Executive Government, in its details, should, as far as possible, be dissevered from party and political influence, and be understood to be held by an officer not interested in, nor even liable to the suspicion of such influence.”

The question, therefore, was considered on its merits at the time, and the Paper which I hold in my hand contains a Treasury Minute embodying the views of the Government on the subject, and placing the office on a permanent footing. On that footing it has been filled by Sir Thomas Larcom, under successive changes of Government, until the other day; and upon that footing there can be no doubt the late Government were justified in filling it up. Having said thus much, I feel bound to add that the late Government seem to me to have committed in this matter two very serious errors of judgment. One of those errors of judgment relates to the time at which the appointment was made; the other to the quarter to which they resorted for a successor to Sir Thomas Larcom as Under Secretary for Ireland. As to the time, I think it was a mistake that a Government in a position which I may call in extremis should have filled up an appointment of such vital importance to the Irish Government at a moment when, indeed the responsibility of the choice was theirs, but when the advantages or disadvantages resulting from that choice were to fall entirely on their successors. I think it would have been a wiser course, and one far more advantageous to the public service to have pursued, if the late Government had endeavoured to induce Sir Thomas Larcom to continue in his office a little longer, and had not exposed the new Government to the inevitable disadvantage of coming into Office with a new Under Secretary entirely unversed in the duties of his Department. So much for the matter of time; and with respect to the other point, relating to what I also ventured to call a grave error of judgment, I must say that it appears to me to have been a grave error of policy as well to have recourse to the Horse Guards and to remove from the Horse Guards to Dublin a gentleman who, however eminent he may be as a soldier—and we all know that in that capacity he is both eminent and experienced—yet had never any experience either of civil affairs in general or of the government of Ireland in particular. Such a choice I cannot look upon as having been wise either in Sir Edward Wetherall's own interests or in the interests of the country. My hon. Friend has observed that Sir Thomas Larcom was a soldier in name, and I have no doubt that if he had remained in the military profession he would have been both a gallant and successful soldier. But not to say that he belonged to that branch of the military service which is most civilian in its character, it is idle to contend that he was a military man for any practical purpose when he was appointed Under Secretary for Ireland.

The truth is that he was for many years of his useful and active life engaged in the civil service of the Irish Government, and that for the last six years previous to his appointment he was employed under the Irish Board of Works. These reasons are, in fact, specially embodied in the Treasury Minute as reasons for his appointment at the time. The fact then remains that the choice of the late Government fell on a distinguished soldier who had not any of those advantages or any of that civil experience which were possessed by his predecessor. I am constrained to say, in answer to the last part of the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend, that the present Government do not, as a matter of principle or of general rule, consider it desirable that this important civil appointment in Ireland should be held by a military man; but that, upon the contrary, they look upon it as necessary for the public service in Ireland that, both in respect of its practical effect on that service and the impression which may be produced on the public mind in that country, the rule should be that this high civil office should be filled by a civilian, according to the custom which obtains in the Government of England at the Home Office. Having said thus much with respect to the general view which the present Government take in regard to this office, I have simply to add a few words as to the view which they take with respect to this particular appointment. In the first place, the present Government are not responsible for the choice which was made by the late Government, who were, strictly speaking, entitled to fill up a vacancy which they had not created. In the next place, I have to state that, in the opinion of the present Government, the very greatest consideration is due to the gallant officer whose case is now before the House. The Government feel sure that Sir Edward Wetherall is wholly blameless in the matter. They feel that he has done nothing whatever which could be regarded as unworthy of his high character and position, and nothing which could disentitle him to receive that equitable and favourable consideration which is due to a distinguished man who, I cannot but think has been placed in a false position. But, carefully subject to these considerations, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the tenure of this high civil office in Ireland by a military officer ought not to be treated by them as a fixed and permanent arrangement, and they hold themselves entirely free to take such opportunities as may present themselves of offering Sir Edward Wetherall such important military or other employment as may be suitable to his rank and claims, and call upon him to accept that employment. That being the view taken by the Government of their duty in this matter, I have only to add that there is nothing which I have said with regard to any part of this transaction which ought to be or can be regarded as in the slightest degree impairing or affecting the character or reputation of Sir Edward Wetherall.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN : Sir, my right hon. Friend has made so fair a defence of the conduct of the late Government on this matter that he has left me very little to say on the subject. It is, I hope, unnecessary for me to corroborate his statement, but I may be allowed to observe that I do not believe an appointment was ever made by any Government so little open to unworthy imputations as that of Sir Edward Wetherall. It was, I must confess, a deep source of grief to find that that appointment was treated by the Irish press and public, totally ignorant as they were of the circumstances under which it was made, in a manner which was calculated to give great pain to one of the most upright and honourable men in Her Majesty's service. The same observation applies to the remarks which have emanated from the same quarters in reference to Sir Thomas Larcom. The conduct of that gentleman has been misrepresented in every sort of way. Belonging to the political party to which my right hon. Friend belongs, he was accused of betraying the interests of that party by not retaining his appointment until they acceded to power, and had an opportunity afforded them of naming his successor. That part of the case my right hon. Friend has entirely cleared up. He knows very well that Sir Thomas Larcom tendered his resignation to us over and over again, and that he was requested to remain in the post which he occupied. It was indeed with the greatest surprise that I learned, almost the first day I arrived in Ireland, from Sir Thomas Larcom that it was his intention to resign. I appeal to my right hon. Friend, who knows the duties of Chief Secretary for Ireland, to judge what would be the position in which I should be placed if he had at once carried out that intention. I did my utmost to endeavour to induce him to retain his office until I became better acquainted with the duties on the discharge of which I had only just entered. He kindly acceded to that request, and the only return he met with from the press in Ireland was being accused of being actuated by unworthy motives, although nothing could be more honourable or straightforward than his conduct. I must say as much with respect to Sir Edward Wetherall, and I will only add to the statement of my right hon. Friend a few particulars in defence of the Government of which I was a member. As soon as I knew that Sir Thomas Larcom intended to resign I consulted the Lord Lieutenant as to the appointment of his successor. We were unanimous in agreeing that the appointment should be made without the slightest reference to political considerations, and I can also assure my right hon. Friend that we felt it our duty to appoint a man who would be agreeable to our successors in Office. These were the motives which actuated the Lord Lieutenant the Earl of Mayo and myself with respect to Sir Edward Wetherall, and I think in the last respect I have mentioned we have succeeded to the utmost of our ambition, for I believe my right hon. Friend will say that in the short experience he has had of Sir Edward Wetherall, that officer devotes himself to the discharge of his business, free from all political bias. That, at least, was the character given of him when we were considering who to appoint, and I believe Sir Edward Wetherall has acted strictly up to that character since he has filled the office. I can only say that neither the Lord Lieutenant nor myself had the slightest previous acquaintance with Sir Edward Wetherall. I did not know him even by sight until the moment when, by the Lord Lieutenant's direction, I offered him the office. In our choice we were entirely guided by the high character we had of Sir Edward Wetherall from several quarters. We inquired in many, civil and military, and heard in all so good a report of Sir Edward Wetherall that at length we fixed upon him. The fact of his being a military man came under our consideration, and no doubt we did feel that it was a question upon which some difference of opinion might exist. But that consideration was quite overborne by the other recommendations we had of Sir Edward Wetherall. My right hon. Friend is in error in supposing that Sir Edward Wetherall's duties have been always entirely of a military character, for he has been in Ireland and has been consulted by the Executive upon matters connected with the Government. But now as to the policy of appointing a military man at all; I confess I was surprised to hear it stated that it was in accordance with the practice in this country a civilian should always be chosen for a civil office. Why, who was the last political Under Secretary of State for the Home Department? A distinguished military officer (Sir James Fergusson); and if my right hon. Friend will look through all the civil appointments of other Governments he will find that, beginning with the Duke of Wellington, no difference has been made in filling those appointments whether by military men or civilians. I was surprised, then, to hear my right hon. Friend agree with so false a statement as that contained in the Question on the Paper.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT complained of this reference to the Question as containing a false statement.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: I intended no offence, but the Question insinuates that it is contrary to the rule of the English Civil Service that an Under Secretary should be a military man, and I controvert that statement. My right hon. Friend says that Sir Thomas Larcom was only an Engineer officer, and was not really a military man. Then, I want to know how it was that my right hon. Friend and the Government with which he was connected so often consulted Sir Thomas Larcom upon military matters? The fact that time after time various Governments in Ireland have so consulted him is unanswerable as showing that the late Under Secretary was really regarded as a military officer; and yet when another military officer is made Under Secretary in his place, objection is taken to the appointment upon political grounds in Ireland, and the gallant officer opposite (Colonel Greville-Nugent) says that Ireland is to be under martial law. We do not consider ourselves under martial law in England when a military man is chosen to fill such a post, and the gallant officer must have got this idea from some extraordinary quarter. I contend that the post is one which may be filled equally well by either a civilian or a military man; and if, in either case, the person occupying that post chooses to act unconstitutionally the gallant officer knows that he would not be allowed to retain it many hours longer. I was surprised, then, at the insinuation made against Sir Edward Wetherall that he would take an unworthy advantage of his position.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT: I never made any charge against Sir Edward Wetherall; I simply objected to the appointment of a soldier to this office.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: Then, what did the gallant officer mean by saying that Ireland would be under martial law because Sir Edward Wetherall was Under Secretary?

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT: I never said any such thing.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: Then, how did the gallant officer intend to argue that Ireland was to be brought under martial law?

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT: I objected to the system of military appointments to such offices.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: The Government will, of course, deal with this question as they think fit, on their own responsibility. All I can say is that Sir Thomas Larcom was a military man, and he remained in this office under seven different Governments, three Conservative and four Liberal; and now for the first time it has been objected that a military man ought not to succeed him, because, forsooth, of the distinction between the engineering branch of the service and that to which Sir Edward Wetherall belongs. I think it was quite unworthy of the Government to take up a position of that kind because there seemed to be an opportunity of getting rid of an official appointed by the late Ministry. I will not believe that the Government will take the course until I see them take it. The appointment was made in a most honourable and straightforward manner. And now let me say a word or two as to the period at which it was made. My right hon. Friend says that it ought not to have been made so closely upon our leaving Office. Why did not the Government act upon the same principle when they themselves went out of Office? Have we not heard of a Lord Lieutenant and several other persons appointed only a few days before they left Office? The fact is that Sir Edward Wetherall's appointment was decided upon before the late Government agreed to go out of Office. It astonishes me to be told that under such circumstances a Government must leave such an appointment to be filled up by their opponents on taking Office. Certainly I have not had much experience in Office, but I have been many years a Member of this House, and to me these are quite new ideas.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: I said it would have been more advantageous to the public service had the appointment been delayed.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: My right hon. Friend said it was injudicious. If the appointment ought to have been delayed, will my right hon. Friend, when the present Government go out of Office, fix a time after which they will fill up no offices, but will leave all appointments to their successors? If my right hon. Friend is ready to give such an undertaking, I can understand and respect his present scruples. As it is, I cannot understand them at all. It is, I believe, an invariable practice that all the vacancies which occur within a reasonable time before the resignation of a Government are filled up by that Government; and I think that if my right hon. Friend will only move for a Return of the number of appointments so filled up within the three weeks before the last six or seven Governments have left Office, he will find that he cannot support the imputation he has cast upon the late Government. Sir, the object I had in rising was to do justice to two most distinguished men. As for myself, I have had a brief experience in Ireland, and it is possible that I may have made mistakes there; but I shall always be of opinion that I have taken part in recommending one of the most distinguished men ever appointed to Office in this country, and I venture to add that when my right hon. Friend knows Sir Edward Wetherall better, he will agree with me that seldom, within his experience, has so good an appointment been made.

Colonel Wilson-Patten

MR. GLADSTONE: I might, Sir, have been very well contented, after the temperate, careful, and able statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to leave the matter where he left it. But some expressions fell from my right hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Colonel Wilson-Patten), which require some notice by me. My right hon. and gallant Friend opposite has heard the admission of my right hon. Friend near me (the Chief Secretary)—an admission freely made on this side of the House—that in this case there was no imputation of motives whatever. In fact, the character of my right hon. and gallant Friend was on that subject quite a sufficient guarantee. But, having regard to his high character and position in this House, it was frankly admitted by my right hon. Friend that no imputation of that kind could for a moment stand. Yet my right hon. and gallant Friend gave us distinctly to understand—I think I am giving the precise effect of his words—that if Her Majesty's Government thought fit to act upon the principles laid down by the Chief Secretary—namely, that it was not desirable that a soldier, never having had experience of civil business, should be the permanent Under Secretary in Ireland; and if they should make some arrangement which would give to Sir Edward Wetherall an appointment elsewhere, the only motive which could be ascribed to us was, that we took this course because an opportunity was offered of getting a gentleman out of Office who had been put there by the late Government.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: I do not think I said that.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad to think I may have misunderstood my right hon. and gallant Friend.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: If I said so, I withdraw the expression.

MR. GLADSTONE: I was sure that my right hon. and gallant Friend must have made that imputation inadvertently. Well, Sir, I must entirely adhere to and support the propositions of my right hon. Friend near me. I am distinctly of opinion that it is a wise and judicious measure by which the Under Secretaryship in Ireland has been made a permanent office. The delicacy of the work of the Executive Government in Ireland is extreme, and it is exceedingly necessary that there should be some person of great experience, authority, and capacity who should be able to carry on the traditions of civil government from one political Administration to another. I was at the Treasury when the office was made permanent, and I do not in the least regret having been a party to that arrangement. So far I am at one with my right hon. Friend opposite, and so far I differ from my hon. and gallant Friend near me (Colonel Greville-Nugent), for he holds that the office ought to be a fluctuating one, and to change with the Government. I feel obliged, however, to demur to the pleas offered in justification by my right hon. Friend opposite in the present instance. In the first place, he thinks that the objection taken by the Chief Secretary for Ireland is, that no Government likely to go out of Office ought to make any appointment whatever. My right hon. Friend did not lay down any proposition so absurd. It may be that it is very proper to make some appointments on the eve of quitting Office. It may be that is an error to make other appointments. The only question is—was this an appointment which it was wise for a Government to make on the very eve of quitting Office? It is not any general rule, but it is the speciality of these appointments on which the objection is founded. My right hon. Friend opposite refers to and claims the practice of England, and says that a distinguished military officer was lately Under Secretary of State for the Home Department; but there is the greatest possible distinction between a political and a permanent Under Secretary. Not only is there that difference, not only has a permanent Under Secretary in every office duties to perform that scarcely attach at all to a political Under Secretary, but my right hon. Friend, when he speaks of Sir James Fergusson as a distinguished military officer must remember that for fifteen or sixteen years he was an active, able, and intelligent Member of this House, constantly giving attention to the general course of its affairs, so that he qualified his military habits by a very large civil experience. It is not to one circumstance alone, but it is to the combined effect of several circumstances we must look in judging such a matter as this. Sir Thomas Larcom began by being an officer of Royal Engineers; he was reared in that corps, from which I venture to say, limited as it is, more persons have been selected for civil appointments than have been taken for them from all the rest of the army; but at an early period of his life he left the military profession and educated himself for civil duties. The combined effect of these two circumstances is to create a difference as wide almost as it is possible to conceive between these two gentlemen. There is no reproach to Sir Edward Wetherall; but I venture to say that an ardent and gallant soldier cannot devote the best part of his life to military duties without losing some of his civil capacities; for the habits of military men tend to give them a mode of viewing affairs which is a soldier's and not a civilian's. But in my opinion you commit a slighter error in appointing a soldier to be permanent Under Secretary of State for the Home Department in England than in appointing him to be permanent Under Secretary in Ireland, for it must be remembered that the general spirit of government in England is civil, while in Ireland, unhappily, it is already too military. It has been found necessary to give to the constabulary a military character in a much greater degree than is desirable in a civilized country enjoying political freedom. It is on that account it is desirable a strong civil influence should be brought to bear upon the spirit of Irish administration by the appointment to the office of permanent Under Secretary of a person who has had some experience of civil duties. I think my right hon. Friend opposite overlooked this consideration—that in case the late Government had not gone out of Office it would not have been any great inconvenience to them to have postponed the appointment for three or four weeks; but in making it as they did, they made themselves the judges of who was a fit person to advise and support the new Lord Lieutenant and the new Chief Secretary; they decided who was to be the prop, stay, and adviser of these officers, and that at a time when it was well known that Irish policy was the cardinal point of public affairs, and when, consequently, it was of the utmost importance they should work with those with whom they enjoyed unbroken sympathy. That being the case, I do not think my right hon. Friend on this side has overstated the matter—while rendering the freest acknowledgments to the late Government in the most important respects—in venturing to say he considers they have not exercised a sound discretion. For my part, I must entirely concur with my right hon. Friend in all the tribute he has rendered to the great merits and the high character of Sir Edward Wetherall. The anxiety of the Government will be to do him no wrong; at the same time, it will be to reconcile that purpose of doing no wrong or injustice with the fulfilment of their duties to the people of Ireland and to the great public interests which are at stake.

ELECTION PETITION JUDGMENTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT rose to call attention—

“To the situation in which the House of Commons is placed by the absence of any authentic record of the judgments delivered by the Judges appointed to try Election Petitions; which judgments interpret and declare, without appeal, the Law of Parliament, upon which depend the rights of the constituencies, the title of their representatives, and the constitution of the House of Commons.”

He said, that since he gave this Notice he had received a great number of letters from different parts of the country which indicated that an extraordinary degree of interest was taken in this question. He did not intend to raise the grave and difficult question of the policy of the change recently made in the tribunal for deciding election petitions. Whether it would ultimately turn out that the Lord Chief Justice was right when he earnestly protested against the scheme adopted last Session, or whether the House of Commons was right when, by a self-denying ordinance—which he might almost describe in the words of the great Italian poet, when he spoke of “the men who through timidity made the great refusal”—it came to the conclusion that it was unfit to be the judge of its own privilege, was a question he would not ask the House to discuss or decide; that must be determined by the experience of the future. Neither did he intend to raise a question as to the propriety of any particular decision. If anyone was disposed to criticise those decisions he was not that person. Assuming the propriety of the change of the tribunal and the absolute justice of its decisions, the point to which he wished to call attention was the situation in which the House was placed by the change which had been enacted. Formerly, a Committee of the House fulfilled the office of jury; it gave a decision upon a particular case; it was no doubt to a certain degree governed by the precedents of the past; but it was also at liberty to decide de novo upon the law as it stood. As soon however as we placed the decision of election petitions in the hands of the Judges we arrived at a new state of things; we got into a region very well known to lawyers, and partially known to laymen—the region known by the name of Judge-made law; when the Judges proceeded to interpret the law, they in fact made the law which they declared. The privileges of Parliament and of the constituencies were now in the hands of the Judges, and yet the House of Commons was absolutely ignorant of their declaration of the law. The other day the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when asked the question, did not even know whether notes had been taken of the judgments, which, being declarations of the law, were the making a law; and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think it was immaterial whether we had them or not. With that view he could not concur, for, as the Judges had the power of deciding on the composition of the House, and of determining, as had been done in one case, that an individual should not be entitled to sit in it for seven years, it seemed to him it was of the first importance that the House should know the grounds on which their decisions were based. The furnishing the House with the Report without the judgments was like supplying them with the mere decree of a Judge of the Court of Chancery. The public would never be content with the mere decrees given in courts of law; the decisions were taken down by skilled professional reporters, and their reports were authoritative; they were regarded in the light of law, and for the future they governed the law. Now, they knew that Her Majesty's Judges, before whom these petitions were tried, had exercised a very wise discretion, and, in the knowledge that the public would expect the reasons for their decisions to be given, they had entered into these reasons at length. In spite of that, however, they were told that the decisions were not to be laid upon the table. This, too, was the more surprising, inasmuch as the evidence taken at the trial of these petitions was forthcoming. In the Bradford case, which was one of great interest, they had a great mass of evidence, but where was the law? He could not understand why the decisions should not be laid on the table, especially as in one case—that of Bewdley—both the evidence and the judgment had been placed before them. He understood that notes of these decisions had been taken, and consequently they could without difficulty be supplied. Now, as a matter of fact, the statutes passed in the House of Commons were sent to Westminster Hall to be made intelligible. When the Statute of Frauds was said by Lord Nottingham to be worth a subsidy, some one remarked that it would cost a subsidy, and the law with which they were now dealing might be subject to a similar remark. The Court of Common Pleas, in a case with regard to securities which came under the provisions of this Act, could not make out what the intention of the Legislature was and after several days' discussion gave the decision one way, because if it was not given that way it must have been given the other. The Court of Common Pleas in Ireland followed the decision of the English court, but acknowledged a preference for the other view of the case. The result of such a state of things, so far as he could observe public opinion, was to excite a great deal of alarm and dismay. Those in the country who desired to see purity of election believed that never at any time were we in so much danger of suffering from electoral corruption. Indeed, they regarded the attempts made by the Legislature in this direction as somewhat resembling the forts at Spithead, about which we had spent so much money and were going to spend so much more, of which it had been said that, having been put up for purposes of defence, they would now serve to guide the enemy safe through the shoals. In fact, it was believed that if a General Election were to be held to-morrow, it would be the most corrupt ever known in this country. He would call the attention of the House more particularly to the law relating to treating at elections, which was on a most unsatisfactory footing. Mr. Rogers, in his able book, published last year, described the law respecting treating in the following terms:—

“Although the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, has in some respects assimilated bribery and treating, there is a wide difference between the nature of the two offences, both as regards the candidate and the voter. The bribed man votes for the candidate whom in his heart, perhaps, he hates or despises; the other follows the impulse of excited zeal and votes for him who has recommended himself by supposed liberality and hospitality. Bribery is directed to obtain the adverse and to fix the doubtful voters; treating is resorted to to confirm the good intentions and keep up the party zeal of those believed to be already in the interest of the candidate. The distinction between the two offences is, it will be seen, clearly recognized in the above-mentioned Act, by which bribery is made an indictable offence, while treating is not made criminal, and the penalty imposed upon the latter is only half of that attached to bribery.”

That he regarded as a very fair description of the present state of the law; and as long as it continued to remain in such a state the public out-of-doors would never believe that the House of Commons were sincere in their desire to put an end to treating. He was almost afraid of referring to an earlier period of English history, as persons who did so were supposed to be in their political dotage. But, in the first Treating Act, in the reign of William III., the matter was very differently dealt with. Upon that subject Mr. Rogers said—

“Treating under this statute, therefore, became an offence without reference to its extent, the intention of the giver, or its effect on the election. The objects of the Legislature, it is imagined, were to put an end altogether to treating within certain periods, to estop the candidates from pleading either moderate or necessary refreshment, and to take away from the House all discretion upon the subject which it was found had been exercised in an arbitrary and unsatisfactory manner.”

In the later statutes, however, a different principle was introduced for the first time, and the word “corruptly” was introduced; and thus was swept away the effectual prevention which was supplied by the Act of William. The introduction of that word, which governed the whole of the law in relation to this matter, was, in his belief, the cause of all the mischief which had excited so much well-founded alarm throughout the country. Mr. Rogers said—

“The word ‘corruptly,’ it will be seen, governs every clause in this section. What is the precise force to be given to this word is by no means clear.”

He had seen with some interest that there existed a borough in Ireland where it was admitted that the sitting Member had spent upwards of £5,000, and had obtained only 127 votes, and the question was reserved for the Court of Common Pleas to determine whether that expenditure had any relation to corruption. Such a state of things reminded him of a passage in Tristram Shandy, where, after a long and learned discussion upon the difference between affinity and consanguinity, Uncle Toby very profoundly remarks—"What you say may be very true, still somehow or other, I cannot help thinking that a man must be some relation to his mother." He, in the same way, could not help thinking that the connection between the expenditure and its object, somehow or other was in this case clearly perceptible. They were told that the main point in determining these matters was the question of intention. He had always understood that the doctrine of the law in respect of intention was that a man was supposed to intend the natural consequence of his own acts. When a man came to a place he had nothing to do with and spent £5,000 about persons whom he never saw before, was it necessary that they should be able to dive into his heart before they could decide whether the expenditure of the money was intended to influence the votes of the electors? The whole of the evil had undoubtedly arisen from introducing the word "corruptly" into the Act, for the introduction of that word had proved nothing short of a mask under which corruption could be practised almost with impunity. There was another subject on which he was sure there existed a deep and painful feeling throughout the country, and that was the entire failure of the provision to prevent the collusive withdrawal of petitions. He had seen in the Lobby a deputation of working-men from a place the name of which he would not mention. They were almost in despair at the position in which they were placed. He had received a letter from one of them, in which it was stated that, with the suddenness of a gunshot, a petition had been withdrawn which they had every reason to believe would have succeeded; that 600 or 700 of them had memorialized the Judge not to allow it to be withdrawn, but he decided that he had no power to prevent its withdrawal; and that if the House did not, in compliance with a petition they intended to send in, direct a trial of the petition there would be a great miscarriage of justice. One of the great scandals of the old system was that on the morning of the race the favourite was scratched. The more money there was on a horse, the greater the certainty of its being scratched on the morning of the race. The more certain a petition was of succeeding if it was proceeded with, the greater the certainty of its being withdrawn. From what he had heard he believed the new Act had not much improved matters in that respect, and he believed that nothing would be accomplished till we had a public prosecutor. As he had said before, the failure was not the fault of the Judges, but the fault of the law they had to administer. It was not necessary he should say that the Judges had administered the law in an impartial and upright manner, and with that learning and intelligence which belonged to them. He thought that the law ought to be amended without delay; and for that reason he had ventured to bring the question before the House, and to ask that, as a preliminary, the authoritative declarations of the Judges as to the present state of the law should be laid before Parliament. He was not an admirer of amateur legislation, and he did not propose to take any further step in the matter; but he asked Her Majesty's Government to take it in hand and deal with it at once. He hoped there was an end of that unconstitutional interregnum when the Government did not govern, and the Opposition did not oppose. We had now a Government with a great majority, and which ought to be able to govern; and we had an Opposition, which, though not so strong as it had been at other times, was under able leadership, and was able and probably willing to oppose. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department would not tell him that the question was going to be sent to a Committee. It embraced only two or three short points; and he ventured to say that the Attorney General and the Solicitor General could in half an hour prepare a Bill that would settle the whole thing. No Commission was required in this case. He was sure that it was a subject on which both sides of the House were of one mind; and under these circumstances he hoped to hear a satisfactory statement from his right hon. Friend.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought the House was indebted to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Vernon Harcourt) for having called attention to a matter of such great interest. He thought the request of his hon. and learned Friend that the decisions of the Judges should be laid upon the table was a reasonable one; and he was happy to say that he believed the Government could comply with it. He was informed that the official shorthand writers, though only required to take notes of the evidence, had, in fact, taken notes of the judgments. Arrangements would therefore be made to obtain the judgments in an authentic form, and lay them upon the table of the House. When they were in the hands of the Government and the House it would be very proper to consider them with a view of seeing what the law was, and whether any amendment was required in it. He must say he was prepared to go a long way with his hon. and learned Friend in his anticipation that it would be found necessary to amend the law, especially as regarded treating; but he did not think they would be in a position to deal with that question till the judgments were before them in authentic form. He was not so sanguine as to concur with his hon. and learned Friend in thinking that a Bill to amend the law could be prepared in half an hour; and he thought that when his hon. and learned Friend had a little more experience in that House he would find that Bills could not be got through quite so rapidly as he seemed to suppose. He believed it would not be possible to make any amendment which could come into operation before the petitions already lodged had all been tried; but the Government would give their attention to the subject at the earliest possible moment after the decisions were laid upon the table. His hon. and learned Friend was under a misapprehension in supposing that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department had intimated that he did not attach any importance to the production of the decisions. What his right hon. Friend had said was that he did not know whether the Government would be able to produce them. As to the appointment of a public prosecutor, he did not hold out any hope that the Government would be able to deal with that question this Session; but it was one which had long engaged his attention. For years he had been in favour of the appointment of a public prosecutor, and he hoped the day was not far distant when we should have a public prosecutor, as all the nations on the Continent had at present.

THE COLLECTION OF TAXES.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES FORSTER rose for the purpose of asking Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to propose any measure respecting the Collection of Taxes similar to that which was introduced in the Session of 1864? He had received strong representations from his constituents as to the hardships inflicted upon them by the existing system. The assessors and collectors were no longer appointed by the vestries, but by the local tax office, and it was not thought right that the vestries should incur responsibility without having power in respect of collection. It was also stated that more collectors were appointed than were required by law or than were necessary, the only result being that the tax-payers had to pay an increased charge. He need not remind the House of the extreme inconvenience entailed upon tax-payers by their being obliged to attend the committees of the Local Commissioners. In one case brought under his notice a gentleman carrying on business in Walsall received a summons on a Sunday to attend the Commissioners seven miles off at ten o'clock next morning, so that he had no time to make arrangements to provide for his necessary business. He knew of another case where a person had been fined for non-attendance at a meeting of one of these committees, he being confined to his bed at the time by severe illness. Although he stated the reason for his non-attendance, he was fined £20, in consequence of some vague rumour that he had been seen at the time at another place. He (Mr. Charles Forster) had himself brought the case under the notice of the Board of Inland Revenue, who, he was bound to say, had immediately remitted the fine, but not until the person aggrieved had been put to considerable inconvenience. In every country except England the Government undertook the duty of collecting their own taxes. In 1864 the present First Lord of the Treasury brought forward a measure to enable the Board of Inland Revenue to relieve the tax-payers from the burden of collecting their own taxes. The scheme of the Bill was a most simple one, and met with general approval until the third reading, when by some unaccountable means it was rejected by a majority of 4. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would signalize his accession to Office by introducing a Bill upon the subject calculated to relieve the tax-payers from the burden they had now to bear. It was just such a subject as a Government, having strong support in Parliament, should address itself to, and the country had a right to expect something at their hands.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I quite agree with the hon. Member for Walsall (Mr. Charles Forster), as to the great anomaly that is involved in the manner of collecting these taxes. It is perfectly true, as he has stated, that the tax-collector is made to serve compulsorily, and is appointed without his consent being obtained. The consequence is that this duty—a most important one—is often placed in very strange hands. I recollect the present First Lord of the Treasury stating to the House that within his own knowledge the office of tax-collector had been filled by a general officer, a retired merchant, a captain of a ship, the head of a grammar school, and a lady. That, I am sure, is not the way in which these taxes ought to be collected. Again, if any defalcations occur, which, unfortunately, sometimes happens, the parish is made liable for their amount, which seems to be a very great hardship. I will not go into detail upon the subject at this hour, but I will just read to the House a short paragraph from Page 29 of the Report which has just been published by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue—

“In connection with this subject—that is, the addition which may be made to the revenue by a closer and more careful assessment and collection of existing duties—we cannot refrain from repeating an often expressed conviction, that the assessed taxes, if entirely taken out of the hands of parochial officers and intrusted to the sole management of this Department, may be made to yield a much larger quota to the income of the country than at present. And we believe that since we first began to ventilate the subject, a great change has taken place in public opinion respecting the antiquated, cumbrous, and inefficient system absurdly named ‘self-taxation,’ and that there will be no difficulty now in superseding it by a better arrangement.”

Then there is this note—

“The following conversation, which really occurred between a member of this Department and a parochial assessor, is worth preserving as an illustration:—‘A.—I see that Mr. B. is not in assessment for either a horse or a carriage, though you know that he keeps both.’ Assessor (who is the principal butcher of the village).—‘Well, Sir, you must not be hard on a poor man like me. Mr. B. is my best customer, and if I were to charge him, after so many years that he has gone on without paying any tax, he would give all his custom to X. at once.’”

On these grounds, and on many others, which it would take too long to state at the present moment, I quite agree with the hon. Member for Walsall that some alteration should be made in the present system of collecting these taxes. But then he has himself stated what is the main feeling in my mind—namely, that an attempt which was made four or five years ago by much stronger hands than mine was most disastrously defeated.—[Mr. Forster: Only by 4 votes.] Yes, but 4 is as good as 40. It also seems that in this Session we are to concentrate our polemical powers chiefly upon one single subject. At the same time I do not say that, even under these circumstances, I shall not make an attempt—I do not pledge myself to do it, but I hope to do so—to attack the whole or a part of this question during the present Session, if I see the least opportunity of doing so. The hon. Member must not, however, be angry with me if this and many other subjects worthy of our attention should, from the pressure of business, have to stand over until another year.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT — CASE OF JOHN KENN.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. COLLINS rose to call the attention of the House to the imprisonment in York Gaol of John Kenn, aged eighty-five, for costs in an action for slander; and to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, power should not be given to the Crown to remit in certain cases imprisonment for debts of this character? It appeared that this old man and his blind and almost equally aged wife lived in a cottage for which they paid 15*d.* a week at Knaresborough, where he had formerly been a cowkeeper, but for several years past he had given up that occupation. They possessed an acre of land, and managed, by the help of their single cow and of the sum of 50s. paid them twice a year by Mother Shepherd's Charity, to keep themselves off the poor rates. Somehow or another, either he, or, as he said, his "missus" managed to get up a quarrel with one of their neighbours who, knowing them to be penniless, commenced an action for slander against him in one of the Superior Courts in London. Not having the money to engage a solicitor or a barrister in his defence or to come up to London in person, Kenn was obliged to allow judgment to go by default, and in September or October he was arrested and taken to the Debtors' Gaol at York for costs. Were not some means adopted for his release this old man would have to rot in gaol, and even if he managed to regain his freedom he would be placed in a most unfortunate position, because his only cow had been sold to pay his rent, and he was also in danger of being tried as a fraudulent bankrupt at the next Assizes. There seemed to be no means known to the law for effecting his release without payment of the money. He brought this case before the House in order to avail himself of the opportunity it would afford him of asking the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it was not desirable that the Home Office should have the power to interfere in cases of this kind, as in criminal cases, and remit the imprisonment.

Mr. BRUCE said, it was very natural for a humane man like the hon. Member, when instances of this sort came to his knowledge, to wish for some short ready remedy for the grievance; but on the part of the Government he was not at all anxious to increase the powers of the Secretary of State for the Home Department relating to the remission of sentences. He might, however, add that he understood that the Bankruptcy Bill about to be introduced by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General contained a provision which would completely meet the case brought forward by the hon. Member.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £6,989 0s. 6d., to make good Excess on Grant for Post Office Packet Service.

Mr. DILLWYN asked for some explanation of this Vote.

Mr. AYRTON said, that this Vote and the one which would be next proposed were required for the purpose of closing past accounts; and pointed to a note appended to the Estimate in the hands of hon. Members as explanatory of the arrears of charges, which it was meant to wipe away. The mode in which the Estimates were now dealt with was rather different from what it had been in former years. Some years ago the Supplies for the Civil Service were granted merely for the service of the year, and any excess in those Supplies remained with the heads of Departments for future expenditure in those Departments. Now, however, the money was not voted for the service, but for the particular amount that would come in course of payment during the financial year in each Department. In consequence of the adoption of the new system a final adjustment of balances had had to be made. An Act had been passed—the Exchequer and Audit Act, which was rather a complicated measure, regulating the precise manner in which Votes were to be accounted for by all the officers of the Crown who were accountants, and balance sheets had to be prepared. For that purpose it became necessary to ascertain the exact balance in the hands of every officer engaged in watching over the expenditure of the public money at the end of the financial year in March, 1868. In order to arrive at that the accounts, for several years past, had to be carefully examined, and many of these accounts were found to result in an excess over the amount available for the public expenditure; while others, on the contrary, resulted in a balance in favour of the Exchequer. The Commissioners of Audit, however, and the gentlemen to whom the investigation of these balances had been specially referred, had arrived at the conclusion that the excess of expenditure over the amounts voted in the different Departments would be covered by the two Votes now laid upon the table. It was necessary to take these Votes for the purpose of setting the accounts right; but he was happy to add that the number of accounts in which the balance in favour of the Exchequer exceeded the expenditure were by far the more favourable class. As far as the accounts had been yet adjusted the aggregate balance in favour of the Exchequer amounted to £844,000, being about £440,000 in excess of the total of balances on the unfavourable side.

MR. DILLWYN said, the explanation just given by the Secretary to the Treasury was much clearer than the footnote appended to the Estimate. He thought, however, that to vote this money as if it were actually needed, when there was more than enough in hand, was rather a bungling way of settling the accounts. It would be much better to have an adjustment of the rival balances, and treat this transaction as an ordinary matter of account.

MR. AYRTON said, an hon. Member asked why the Government paid the light dues for the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, while they would pay them for no other packet company in the kingdom? It was impossible to deal with the balances in the manner suggested by the hon. Member for Swansea, inasmuch as the Estimates were framed with the object of showing every item expended on the national account, without reference to receipts. Every effort was being made by the Treasury to keep the expenditure as closely as possible to the Votes granted by the House. Other Questions he thought might more properly be reserved until the Estimates for the present year were brought forward.

Vote agreed to.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that St. James's Palace during the last four years had cost £40,000 in repairs, yet here was another item of £7,704 outstanding for Royal Palaces, which were explained to mean Windsor Castle, Kensington, and St. James's Palaces. How was this? There was an item of £18,000 in the Supplementary Estimates for printing and stationery, yet here was a further item of £8,468 of excess on the same head. There was also an excess of more than £18,000 in the Law Courts of Ireland for pensions and retiring allowances. He could not understand why there should be an item of £2,690 for Nonconforming and other ministers in Ireland unpaid. These were not men who could have got on without their salaries, and the amount must have been voted in the proper year. Then there was an item of "miscellaneous expenses from civil contingencies" of £5,053, which was explained to arise from the item for robes, collars, and badges of the various orders of knighthood, though the sum voted last Session for these things was thousands in excess of previous years. The result at which he had arrived was, that it was impossible for anybody to understand how these accounts were managed.

MR. AYRTON said, that these were not monies that were being voted for future payment in a Supplementary Estimate, but an adjustment of accounts for past payments. The item for Royal Palaces referred to unforeseen expenditure incurred before the end of March, 1868. It related to money actually spent, and had no bearing on the Vote of last year. The Vote for Printing and Stationery was also required to adjust the expenditure under the new Parliamentary mode of keeping the accounts. As the new system was not at first properly carried out, it happened sometimes that there was not in law any money applicable to the payment of any deficiency. When these Votes were adjusted it would be impossible for the same thing to occur again. In regard to the Vote for New Robes and Orders it was placed in the Estimates of a subsequent year, though the payment ought to have been a charge upon the Estimates for the year ending March, 1868. The Committee should clearly understand that they were now engaged in an adjustment of accounts, and were not really voting any public money.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was afraid that under these circumstances any reduction in the Votes would be a Motion to pay so many shillings in the pound.

MR. AYRTON said, that they would now start with a clear account for all these heads of expenditure, and what had before occurred would not occur again.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. MUNTZ said, he was afraid that money had been spent first, and was to be voted afterwards; at least such appeared to have been the practice under the late Government.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION.—REPORT.

Resolution [March 4] reported.

On Motion "That the Resolution be agreed to,"

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to take the opportunity of impressing on the Government the necessity of having more speedy and satisfactory accounts from India. Merchants, even in such small matters as having ships in India, found no difficulty in communicating with them by telegram and giving directions as to what cargoes they should bring home. He could not, therefore, comprehend the peculiar difficulty of communicating with the Government of India with respect to these great matters of account. The Chancellor of the Exchequer ought really to be able to tell them a little more of this Supplemental Estimate than he had done. Those who had experience in business could not understand the difficulties with which he was beset. There was another point which was not alluded to last night, and which he must impress on the Government. The Foreign Office should not send consuls to places where they were not wanted, and they could not be too careful in their selection of those they did send, for many of them were very peculiar men, and we were responsible for them. He hoped they had now heard the last of the Abyssinian war. It was all very well to talk of the honour and glory of the expedition, and of "the banner of St. George floating on the mountains of Rasselas;" but the tax-payers of this country had in the end to pay rather heavily for all these things.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sorry he could not give the hon. Gentleman any further information on this subject than he had stated last evening. He was not Chancellor of the Exchequer for India, and had no official pecuniary relations with India. He had neither been able to extract from the Indian Government any account, nor any account why they did not render one.

Resolution agreed to.

(Mr. West, Mr. Basley, Mr. Davison.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. West.)

MR. CROSS said, he believed the principle was a right one. It was much better for the interests of the country that people who lived in such populous districts as Manchester and Liverpool should have the opportunity of suing in this court, without going to Preston for the purpose of having their proceedings passed. Attornies practising in those parts would as soon have their pleadings carried on in London as in Preston. He should like to have some assurance, however, that the present officer of the court at Preston would not be damaged by the Bill, and that time would be given for the consideration of its details.

MR. BAZLEY said, he was convinced that the measure would prove to be of great practical utility. The Bill had the sanction of some of the most eminent legal men in Lancashire. He therefore gave it his support.

MR. HERMON said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill would consent to postpone the second reading.

MR. WEST thanked his hon. and learned Friend the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) for the favourable opinion he had given, as no one, from his experience of the way in which business was conducted in the court, was better able to form an opinion as to the merits of the Bill. The Bill was generally approved of in Lancashire, and he could assure the House that the present prothonotary would not be subjected to any loss, but, on the contrary, the position of that officer would be improved by the passing of the Act.

MR. AYRTON observed that if no objection was made to the second reading of the Bill, the Government must not be understood to acquiesce in all its provisions. There were some clauses, particularly those relating to fees, which required consideration.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON declared his desire to see these ancient courts swept away and local courts established throughout the country, and justice made accessible to all classes. That would best be done by a great and comprehensive scheme of legislation. He abstained from opposing the Bill, on the ground that as long as this court lasted—and he hoped it would not last long—they should make it as efficacious as they could.

Motion agreed to.

(Mr. Sykes, Mr. Clay, Mr. Ward Jackson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. C. SYKES, in moving the second reading of this Bill, stated that on Tuesday next a large number of gentlemen interested in the ornithological history of the country would meet at the Zoological Society's rooms to discuss the subject which he had brought forward, as a farmer's question, and as a merchant seaman's and deep sea fisheries' question. Disclaiming all acquaintance with the natural history point of view, he thought the subject deserving of the consideration of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. C. Sykes.)

MR. O. STANLEY supported the second reading. He deemed that the Bill was one which it was important to pass, not only for the purpose of stopping the wanton cruelty of destroying sea birds, but because their preservation tended to prevent the occurrence of many shipwrecks. He had received a letter from Sir F. Arrow, Deputy Master of the Trinity Board, in which the writer stated that the Board attached the greatest importance to the preservation of sea-fowl, as the best of all warnings to seamen when in proximity of land in thick weather, and that he quite approved the Bill, but wished it could be extended to prevent the taking of eggs also. With regard to the latter point, he believed that the hon. promoter of the Bill was willing to include eggs within its provisions.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday next.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—LEAVE.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in rising to move for leave to introduce a Bill to consolidate and amend the Law of Bankruptcy, said, that whatever might be the successes of modern legislation, among them could not be reckoned the attempts to legislate in respect to bankruptcy. More than sixty years ago Lord Eldon, speaking of the then Bankruptcy Law, said, that in a number of cases its provisions were little more than stock-in-trade for Commissioners, assignees, and other officials, and the present Bankruptcy Law had been spoken of in terms of condemnation no less strong by the highest legal authorities in both Houses, and by the most eminent commercial men. The failure to deal successfully with this question had not arisen from want of attempts, for the Legislature, for the last half-century, had been almost constantly passing Bankruptcy Bills. There was one passed in 1825, and others again were passed in 1826, 1831, 1842, 1844, 1849, and 1861; and yet, notwithstanding all that legislative activity, it might fairly be questioned whether the Bankruptcy Law at the present moment was in a more satisfactory state than in Lord Eldon's time. Indeed, it might be questioned whether in some respects it was not worse. These considerations led to the conclusion that a sufficient remedy was not to be sought in a mere alteration of details. The time for patching up the Bankruptcy Law had passed. They must now go to the very root of the matter, and reform the system altogether. In recent times much thought and attention had been devoted to the subject. In 1863 a Committee of that House was appointed, consisting of men eminently qualified to deal with the question. That Committee took a great deal of evidence, and reported in 1864. The Report contained a number of valuable suggestions, some of which must form the basis of any satisfactory bankruptcy measure. In consequence of that Report several Bankruptcy Bills were introduced into both Houses of Parliament. In 1866 a Bankruptcy Bill was introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), at that time Attorney General, and in the following year another Bankruptcy Bill was brought in by Sir John Rolt, then holding the same office. Last year a Bankruptcy Bill, containing 500 clauses, was introduced by Lord Cairns in the other House, but from causes over which their authors had no control, all these Bills experienced an untimely fate. But, though none of them passed the Legislature, they had greatly facilitated the amendment of the Bankruptcy Law, inasmuch as each of them contained a number of valuable provisions. Therefore, the task he now desired the House to enter upon was rendered comparatively easy, though he did not disguise from himself that many difficulties still remained. In dealing with this question it was necessary to recur to first principles, and they had to ask themselves what was the object of a Bankruptcy Law. It appeared to him that the object could be stated in a few words. The object was to collect the proceeds of the estates of bankrupts, and to distribute them among the creditors as fairly, cheaply, and speedily as possible. That appeared to be the sole object of a Bankruptcy Law, and by attempting to do more they had done less. Previous legislation had departed from that simple principle, and had so far done wrong. From the earliest time of the Bankruptcy Law—that of Henry VIII.—until a comparatively recent period, the main object of the law had been to punish the bankrupt, who was denied his discharge upon any terms, and was treated more as a fraudulent than an ordinary debtor, or rather as a quasi criminal—and, indeed, at one time, a law was in force whereby, if he had not been able to prove that he had incurred his debts honestly, he was put in the pillory and had his ears cut off; but in later times a reaction had occurred too much in favour of the bankrupt, and judging from the effects of recent Bankruptcy Laws their object seemed to have been to protect the bankrupt against the creditor, to enable him to get rid of his debts and liabilities with the least possible trouble or annoyance to himself, to facilitate him in defrauding those to whom he was indebted, and in setting them at defiance; and a witness before a Committee declared that many debtors appeared to think it a duty to their families to take the benefit of the Bankruptcy Law once in seven years. It was right that the House should bear in mind the principal evils of the present system. One of these appeared to be that the Commissioners who administered the affairs of bankruptcy—he alluded principally to those of the principal court of London—though undoubtedly able men and faithful public servants, had failed to obtain the confidence of the public. This arose from various reasons. One was the defective state of the law, which mixed up judicial with administrative functions, which ought to be kept separate. Another reason was that their decisions were not uniform, and, consequently, the result was much uncertainty in the law. Again, they had exercised no sufficient control over their subordinate officers, and scandals had arisen among officials of the bankruptcy courts which were totally unknown in other courts. Then, again, the bankruptcy courts were overloaded by worse than useless officials who have helped to devour bankrupts' estates, and the result was that there had been much delay and negligence in collecting the effects of bankrupts, that those effects had been in many cases divided unequally, that in other cases in minute portions and after a long delay. The collection and distribution had been enormously expensive, and the public for these reasons dreaded the Court of Bankruptcy, and creditors were ready to agree to anything in order to avoid that tribunal. Such had been the dread of the Court of Bankruptcy that debtors had held it in terrorem over the heads of their creditors in order to force them into unfair compositions. The necessity for bankruptcy reform was universally admitted; but he would quote one or two figures to illustrate what he had said. The Returns for 1867 showed the total number of adjudications in bankruptcy was 8,994, of which 6,533 were made on the petition of the bankrupt himself. Further, out of these 8,994 cases, there were 5,876 in which no dividend whatever was paid, and in half of the 1,649 cases in which a dividend was paid that dividend amounted to less than 2s. 6d. in the pound. Exact information as to the cost of collecting and distributing assets was very difficult to obtain; the most favourable estimate he had heard was 33 per cent, but he was inclined to think that that was far too favourable. In the evidence before the Committee of 1864 of Mr. Clarke, the accountant, this is reported—

"I see by the account that in respect of the sum of £489,911 paid in dividends there have been incurred expenses amounting to £157,299, and in addition all the expenses of the Court, £126,213 1—Yea. Making altogether £283,512 1—Yea."

That was nearly 60 per cent. Referring to a speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), in introducing his Bankruptcy Bill in 1866, he found this statement with reference to 1865—

"The total assets realized amounted to £356,955 9s. 8d. It was estimated by good authority that, including all costs, no less than £370,000 odd was expended in collecting and distributing that £356,955; while the whole amount of the dividends was only £434,952 12s. 10d., so that the expenses of collection and distribution amounted to 75 per cent on the sum divided."—[3 Hansard, cxxxiii. 689.]

In some cases the expense was even greater; one case had come to his knowledge in which £244 had been spent in collecting £66; and this, he believed, was but one of a great number. Having said sufficient to account for the general dissatisfaction with the present law, he would address himself to the remedy. But before he proceeded to the subject of bankruptcy proper, it was necessary to deal with a preliminary question of much importance—namely, the subject of imprisonment for debt: the weight of authority on this subject was overwhelming. The abolition of imprisonment for debt had been recommended by a Royal Commission in 1832, by the Bankruptcy Commissioners in 1842, and by a Committee of the House of Commons in 1864; each of the Bills also introduced in consequence of the Report of that Select Committee had proposed the abolition of imprisonment for debt. As for the principle of imprisonment for debt, if imprisonment was to be treated as a punishment, it was unjust, because it confounded the innocent with the guilty; if it were treated as a remedy, recent legislation had made it quite ineffectual. An imprisoned debtor could immediately appeal to the court and obtain a discharge, and in the case of debtors who did not appeal the Registrar attended periodically and released them whether they willed it or not. To revert to the old system was impossible; nothing remained to be done but to abolish imprisonment for debt altogether. But there was one exception to be made to this, and that had reference to the powers of the County Court Judges, who had power to imprison in cases where a debtor had means and refused to pay, or where he had contracted a debt fraudulently. He confessed he desired the abolishment of this power also, but did not see his way clear to doing so, because almost all the County Court Judges were of opinion that if they were deprived of this power the efficiency of the County Court system would be destroyed. The Government, however, had decided to modify the law in this respect by providing that no warrant for imprisonment should be granted except by the Judge in open court, for there was reason to suppose some loose practice had been carried on in the way of committing persons to prison without sufficient evidence; and that the County Court Judges should make a Return to Parliament every year of the number of committals made, that the system might be amended if it was found to work ill. He should be glad to hear this matter discussed, and especially glad if it could be shown that it would be safe to abolish the exceptional power he referred to altogether. He proposed to deal with the question of abolishing imprisonment for debt by a separate Bill, to be introduced a few days hence; the present Bill would refer only to bankruptcy. The evidence taken before the Committee established distinctly two things. First, that the English system of bankruptcy had substantially failed; and, secondly, that the Scotch system of bankruptcy had substantially succeeded. The conclusion naturally pointed to the adoption of the Scotch system, which had been more or less adopted by every Bill based upon the Report of the Commissioners; but the Bill he was now asking leave to introduce adopted the Scotch system more nearly and completely than any Bill hitherto submitted to Parliament. The great merit of the Scotch system was its simplicity; the absence of officialism; allowing the creditors to administer the estates in bankruptcy by themselves, and in their own way without interference and with only the necessary supervision of the court, and the separation of the administrative and judicial functions. These were the principles the Government proposed to adopt in the Bill he was about to introduce, and he would proceed to state in what manner they would work. The first thing they proposed was, when a man committed certain specified acts of bankruptcy, or being called on to pay a debt, he did not come into court and deny it on his oath, nor pay it, he should be adjudicated a bankrupt, and then his creditors would be called together. A preliminary proof of debts would be taken before the Registrar, in order to determine the right of creditors to vote at that meeting. There would then be three courses open to the creditors—They could accept a composition, and then there was an end of the bankruptcy; they could, if they pleased, agree to a deed of arrangement—and there would be provisions in the Bill whereby the Judge of the Bankruptcy Court would finally determine the validity of all such deeds, so that they might not be contested, as they frequently were in other courts—or the creditors might, if they chose, proceed in bankruptcy. If they did proceed in bankruptcy they would elect a trustee. Now, that trustee was not to be an official of the court; he might be anybody whomsoever they might select. Their choice was absolutely unfettered. They would select their own trustee and decide on the terms of his remuneration. That was essentially the Scotch system. In Scotland the effect of the system had been to call into existence a number of persons who made the office of trusteeship a kind of profession, and they succeeded in proportion to their diligence, capability, and trustworthiness. If a trustee did not manage an estate well, and only realized small dividends, he would not get much employment. It was in this as in other professions. The effect of a similar law in this country would, he believed, be to create a similar profession, so that there would be no difficulty in the way of creditors in the choice of able and efficient trustees. The trustee would receive proof of debts, and would determine thereon subject to an appeal to the Judge. He would proceed to realize the estate, to declare dividends, and generally to wind-up the estate. But he would be subject to certain checks and control. One check would be this—The creditors would elect some of their number—in Scotland they were called commissioners, here they would be called inspectors, but the name signifies little—who would keep a watch and exercise some supervision over the trustee: further, his accounts would be audited by the accountant in bankruptcy, and the whole system would be superintended by the Judge. In certain cases where, upon the application of a creditor, the step seemed to be necessary, power was given to appoint a receiver before the appointment of a trustee, and the Judge would have authority in particular circumstances, if he saw there were no dividends to be realized, to supersede the bankruptcy. Such was an outline of the system they proposed to establish, which he believed was almost entirely in accordance with the Scotch system. In all discussions on Bankruptcy Law certain cardinal questions arose with respect to which he might be fairly asked what course it was proposed to take. One of those questions was, whether or not they should allow a debtor to make himself bankrupt on his own petition. He answered that they did not propose that he should. As long as imprisonment for debt remained, it was but fair that a man should be able to release himself from imprisonment by an appeal to the Bankruptcy Court; but with the abolition of imprisonment for debt it appeared to him that the benefit of any such privilege should cease. Let it be borne in mind that the object of the Bankruptcy Law was not to benefit the bankrupt, but the creditors. It was for the fair distribution of the bankrupt's estate. Therefore, it seemed to the Government that the Bankruptcy Law should not be put in motion by the bankrupt himself, but at the suit of the creditor, and by that provision he believed they should at once get rid of a vast number of bankruptcies in which no dividend was made and by which the Court of Bankruptcy was incumbered. And here he might refer to figures before quoted in order to show that the greater number of bankruptcies, at present, were on the bankrupt's own petition, and scarcely in any of these was any dividend taken. There was another question of very great importance, on which he was aware there was a great diversity of opinion, and that was as to the terms on which a bankrupt should be discharged—whether or not his after-acquired property should be liable to his creditors. Now, it seemed to the Government that his after-acquired property should be liable for his debts, but liable only to a limited extent. Let them consider what was the contract to which a bankrupt was subject. It was to pay his creditors in full; and if they stepped in with the legislation for the relief of that contract they had a right to impose conditions and to insist that the after-acquired property should be liable to some extent. But if they made it liable to an unlimited extent and for an unlimited time, they would crush and paralyze the man and prevent him perhaps from ever succeeding in life. They therefore proposed a course between the two extremes—that the after-acquired property should be liable for a certain time—namely, for six years, unless he had paid a dividend to a certain amount, and that dividend was fixed at 10s. in the pound, subject of course to a certain alteration in the figures. It was provided that it should not be liable at the mere discretion of creditors, but only upon an order in court; but at the same time any creditor would have the power of releasing his debt, and a large majority of creditors—five-sixths, he believed was the Scotch system—would be able to release the bankrupt altogether. He knew that the fixing of a certain dividend was a very vexed question. The main argument in its favour was this—that by fixing a dividend they encouraged the man to stop before his estate was dissipated, and it was most desirable to do so. It was sometimes suggested that bankrupts would obtain a great quantity of goods on credit for the purpose of swelling their dividends. That was an evil which would sometimes occur, but its possibility did not appear to outweigh the advantages of fixing a certain dividend. The proposition which he made on this point was in accordance with recommendations of the Committee of 1864, and with the authority of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) as appeared by the Bill of 1866. Besides, he thought they would be able to meet the difficulty by an increased stringency in the criminal law, and that brought him to another part of the subject. It appeared to the Government that the Committee were right when they recommended that the Court of Bankruptcy should not be a criminal court, but that it should be confined to the administration of the bankrupt's estate, and that whatever criminal offences a bankrupt might commit should be tried by the ordinary criminal tribunals. He believed it to be a sound principle, although they had departed from it in 1861, when they gave to the Court of Bankruptcy a sort of quasi criminal—as it were a censorial—jurisdiction. Power was given to the court to punish offences of a semi-legal, semi-commercial character—offences not against the law of the country, but against a certain undefinable code of commercial morality. For instance, a bankrupt was to be punished for living extravagantly, or entering into imprudent speculations. Now, it appeared to the Government that this censorial jurisdiction, which was admitted on all hands to have failed—he believed it had been scarcely ever exercised, or, if so, it had been exercised with no advantage—should be abolished, and there was a general concurrence of opinion to that effect. They gave the Court of Bankruptcy all the powers necessary to deal with the estate of the bankrupt, and to enforce discovery; but they gave the criminal tribunals all the power to deal with any offence he may have committed against the law. They repealed an Act, the wisdom of which he never could see, which prevented the magistrates of quarter sessions from trying offences against the Bankruptcy Act, so that while they took from the Court of Bankruptcy its criminal jurisdiction they rendered more stringent the criminal law. The question was still under the consideration of the Government, but they hoped to submit the House clauses by which offences against the Bankruptcy Law would be clearly defined. He proposed to enact in this Bill the substance of some of the clauses of Lord Cairns' Bill of last year, which were to this effect—Certain acts of the bankrupt—such, for example, as concealing goods or destroying or mutilating books—were made offences without the necessity of proof of intent. As the law now stood, they must prove, not only that the bankrupt did that, but that he did it with intent to defraud, and it was often a very difficult thing to prove such an intent. The Bill proposed that certain acts should in themselves be held to be fraudulent, and to be offences, unless the bankrupt himself showed that they had been done innocently. Although that was, he admitted, to some extent exceptional legislation, he believed it would be effective. But as those provisions would probably come better in a separate Bill, he proposed to bring in another measure, the title of which would be, "A Bill to abolish Imprisonment for Debt and to punish Fraudulent Debtors." There was another matter cognate to that to which he would now refer. Complaints had been made that bankrupts by settlements and post-nuptial settlements frequently contrived to cheat their creditors. As the law now stood there was great difficulty in upsetting those settlements, because they had to prove—which it was often far from easy to do—that bankrupts at the time they made them were actually insolvent. He proposed, therefore, that all post-nuptial settlements which should be followed by bankruptcy within two years should be absolutely void, unless the bankrupts could prove affirmatively that they were solvent when they made them. The next question—and it was a very important one—was by whom was the law to be administered?—for the best law, unless well administered, will fail. In the country he proposed that the law should be administered by a County Court Judge, subject to the continuance of the bankruptcy districts as long as the present district Commissioners held their offices, after which time they would be absorbed into the County Courts. He now came to the court in London, which would comprise several County Court districts in itself. It had appeared to the Government desirable that the new system should be set in motion and superintended by a superior Judge of the highest authority. He wished to speak with no disrespect of the present Bankruptcy Commissioners; on the contrary, for many of them he had the highest esteem. Still, he thought it almost impossible that those gentlemen, some of whom were advanced in years, and who had been long accustomed to the present system, could be expected to inaugurate the new system with sufficient energy and authority. It was therefore deemed advisable that a superior Judge should be appointed, and accordingly it was proposed that Her Majesty should have power to appoint one of the Judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law. The Government were in hopes that no addition to the number of Judges would be necessary, for although the whole number—namely, eighteen—were now occupied, three of them being engaged in trying election petitions, yet the present labours of those three, it was to be hoped, would be soon over; and it was also to be hoped that for some years there would be very few election petitions for them to try, in which case they would be relieved of a great portion of that work, and might be better able to attend to the bankruptcy business. At the same time, as the Government had no wish to impose duties too onerous on the Common Law Judges, there would be power given by the Bill to appoint another Judge, if necessary. The functions of the Judge would be these—He would have to frame, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, rules and regulations for the purpose of regulating the practice in the local courts and in his own court. The Government desired to leave as much scope as possible for rules and regulations, and not attempt to legislate for every conceivable case or point of practice, because if they did so their Bill must run to enormous length. It was far better to allow matters of procedure and detail to be settled by general orders, if they had confidence in their tribunal; and if they had not confidence in their tribunal, they ought not to intrust it with these functions at all. They had empowered the Judge of the Probate Court to frame such rules and regulations, and the system had there been found to work exceedingly well. Again, as to the Judges appointed for the trial of election petitions, Parliament had not attempted to fetter them by legislating for every point of practice, but had left them with the power of framing their own rules and regulations; they had set themselves most diligently to work for that purpose, and their rules and regulations answered very well. It was, therefore, proposed to give to the Lord Chancellor and the Judge in Bankruptcy the power of framing rules and regulations for determining the procedure of the Bankruptcy

Court. Of course, he would also exercise a supervision over all the officers of his court; and it was to be hoped that none of the fantastic tricks sometimes played by such officials would be again heard of. It was likewise proposed that there should be a power to remove, if necessary, cases of great importance and which would be somewhat too heavy for the County Courts to the court in London; and they further intended to give the Judge the power—and he thought it was a very important one—of summoning juries for the purpose of trying any bankruptcy cause which might arise. For example, sometimes a debtor, on being summoned to court, denied the debt and swore that he had a good defence; in which case the matter was sent to a Common Law Court, and a debtor, by obtaining a special jury, might frequently succeed in delaying the trial for a year. It was therefore proposed to give the Judge in Bankruptcy the power of summoning a jury and trying the question at once. They also proposed to empower the Judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law to send what he might call bankruptcy causes, such as fraudulent preference, and the like, to be tried in the Bankruptcy Court; and in that manner a great amount of relief would be given to what he might term the congestion of causes at Guildhall and Westminster. He now came to the question of appeals. They proposed that appeals should go to the court from which the Judge came, and that its decision should be final, except in cases where the court might think fit to grant a special case, or reserve special points for the House of Lords. Now, of course the plan which he had sketched would involve a certain amount of compensation to those whose services they proposed to dispense with; but he was happy to inform the House, from inquiries which he had made, that he believed the fund of the Bankruptcy Court would be more than sufficient to meet all the claims of that kind which would arise. He would only further say that the Bill which he had to lay before the House would be a Consolidation Bill, containing, he believed, the whole of the Bankruptcy Law, so that the man who held it in his hand would have all the information that was necessary without having to go back to previous statutes. It was also proposed to simplify the Bill as much as possible. The Bill of last year contained upwards of 500 clauses; and another Bill for the abolition of imprisonment for debt contained sixty to seventy, making between the two about 600 clauses altogether. Now, he confessed he looked with dismay on the task of passing a measure of 600 clauses. The Government draftsman had therefore been instructed—and he would, no doubt, obey his instructions—to shorten and simplify as much as possible, and he believed that the measure which he would lay on the table would not be one-third of the length of that introduced last year. In conclusion, he could only thank the House for listening with so much patience to what had been necessarily a long and dry statement, but he had endeavoured to be as brief and as clear as he could. He would only say that the Government had been most anxious in framing the Bill to consult the wishes of the commercial classes, and had put themselves in communication with a number of the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country which represented a great amount of the opinion of those classes. They had received from those bodies a number of valuable suggestions, many of which they had adopted. He was not sanguine enough to suppose that the Bill was entirely without its defects; indeed, he looked forward to its being materially improved when it went before a Committee of the House. And of this he felt assured that the Government, in their attempt to deal with that important and difficult question would receive the candid consideration, and he believed he might say the co-operation of both sides of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. NORWOOD said, he had never heard so satisfactory an explanation of a measure for amendment of Bankruptcy Law as that which had just been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, whom he might almost have imagined to be a commercial man with great experience of the abuses of the present system. Without attempting to go into details he might, he believed, say on the part of the mercantile community that the Bill would, as regards its main provisions, meet with their entire approval. The Scotch Law had worked well, and he was glad that its main principles would be embodied in the Bill, and the more so as the question of assimilating the commercial laws of the United Kingdom was one of the highest importance. The Irish Bankruptcy Law was not satisfactory in the opinion of many Irish Members, and if that were so, he trusted it also would be assimilated to the present measure. With regard to many of the points just referred to there would doubtless be much variety of opinion in the commercial world; but with respect to the subject of post-nuptial settlements, he, for one, entirely concurred in what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman. As to the question of the Judge, however, he confessed it was rather a difficult one. When the present law was enacted Lord Westbury desired that a Chief Judge should be appointed, but he was overruled, and this was certainly a matter which would require the calm and earnest consideration of the mercantile community. He agreed in the broad principle laid down by the Attorney General, that the chief object of Bankruptcy Law should be to enable the assets to be collected and distributed as quickly and as economically as possible. In conclusion, he expressed his opinion with the approval, he believed, of his mercantile friends around him, that this appeared to be one of the most satisfactory measures which had ever been presented to the House of Commons.

MR. BARNETT said, he was anxious to offer his tribute of congratulation to the hon. and learned Gentleman for having introduced this Bill at so early a period of the Session, when there was time to bring it to a successful issue. The existing law had been felt by all persons engaged in trade to be a disgrace to our code for several years past. With regard to the details of the Bill, it would, of course, be premature to offer any remarks at present; but he cordially agreed with those provisions of it which proposed to assimilate the English with the Scotch system of bankruptcy, which, it was admitted on all sides, had worked well. He approved of the abolition of imprisonment, and that the future acquired property of a bankrupt should be made liable. It was desirable that bankrupts' estates should be economically as well as speedily realized, and he hoped the provisions of the Bill were such as would realize both those objects, and the costs be thereby greatly diminished. It appeared to him, however, that if all the cases in bankruptcy were to be taken before one Judge great delay must necessarily ensue. It was rather a satire upon the working of the present system that the funds of the wretched estates that had not been distributed to expectant creditors were sufficient with which to pension the officials of the present Bankruptcy Court.

MR. CRUM-EWING congratulated the country on at last having a measure before it which would assimilate the Law of Bankruptcy in this country to the excellent system of Scotland, and paid a high tribute of praise to the Lord Advocate, to whose efforts they were indebted for the Scotch Law, observing that if he had never done anything else, or did anything more, that act alone would place him as a commercial lawyer on the highest pinnacle of fame.

MR. RATHBONE said, he thought there ought to be an official similar to a public prosecutor in bankruptcy cases, because it not unfrequently happened that the interests of the public did not concur with those of either the creditors or the debtor. The interests of public credit and of public morality were often at stake, and surely the commercial morality of a nation like ours was of the highest importance, for if England were to retain her proud position as the centre of the financial operations of the world there must be no recurrence of the commercial scandals which had come to light during the last few years. He regretted, therefore, that the Government had not seen their way to provide some machinery for the protection of the interests of the public in this respect.

MR. HERMON approved generally of the Bill, but thought that the provision requiring a bankrupt to show a certain amount of dividend ought to specify a limit in point of time prior to the bankruptcy. He was also of opinion that the Bill ought to contain a clause providing that every trader who became bankrupt should show that he had taken stock and made up a balance-sheet once in every year.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY thanked the Attorney General for the very able statement he had laid before the House, and he wished at the same time to express his opinion that the Bill he had brought forth was one which would give great satisfaction to the commercial community. At present it was found that the Bankruptcy Law was so eaten up with officialism and expenses that a debtor had only to threaten his creditors that if they did not accept the composition he offered he would go through the Bankruptcy Court in order to induce them to accept whatever he chose to offer. The plan shadowed forth by the Attorney General was, that a man might not make himself bankrupt, but that his creditors must judge whether they would make him a bankrupt or not, and when they had made him a bankrupt they were not to hand over all his effects to officials, but they were themselves to have the power of handling his effects. He thought that was just what was wanted, and he was sure that the Bill would meet with the hearty support of the mercantile community. He looked on the brevity of the Bill as not the least of its merits.

MR. CROSS also expressed his approval of the measure in general terms, and thanked the Attorney General for the courtesy which he had displayed towards the members of the Chambers of Commerce who had waited upon him on the subject. The main principle of the Bill, that of placing the liquidation of a bankrupt's estate in the hands of mercantile men instead of in the hands of lawyers, would, he felt assured, be hailed with satisfaction by the commercial community. He sincerely trusted that the learned Attorney General would be more fortunate with this Bill than his predecessors had been with the Bills which they had brought forward. One of the great features of the Bill was that it separated the administrative from the judicial functions of the Court of Bankruptcy. At the same time he regretted that no provision had been made for seeing that the bankrupt who committed a fraudulent act should be brought before a court of justice, because he did not at present see whose interest it was that such a person should be punished. He should also like to have some information respecting the County Courts. This Bill would throw a great deal of extra work upon them, but he knew that if the present arrangement were continued the extra work would be a great deal more than they could manage.

MR. MORLEY said, he hoped that the hon. and learned Attorney General would lose no time in placing the Bill in the hands of hon. Members, so that, consistently with a due consideration of the measure, as little delay as possible should take place in the passing of the Bill through that House. He believed that no Bill which the Government had introduced this Session would give so much satisfaction to the country at large as that which had been shadowed out by the hon. and learned Gentleman that evening. He was convinced that the proposal to appoint a Chief Judge would be most acceptable, especially in the City of London, where the judgments of the Commissioners had so varied that the mercantile community would be thankful to have an authoritative decision in Basinghall Street. He likewise rejoiced at the declaration of the Government that the time had come when imprisonment for debt should cease. At the same time he was rather glad to hear that the Attorney General was not prepared to put an end to the power of the County Court Judge, to deal with cases of contempt, and those of traders who should refuse to obey any order he might make in respect to their debts. He approved of the separation of the administrative from the judicial functions of the court, but thought that some means other than those existing were needed for originating proceedings against fraudulent debtors. He believed that the Bill pointed to the appointment of a public prosecutor, and he should be happy if such should be the result of the discussion which would take place upon the measure.

MR. CRAWFORD, on the part of the commercial community with which he was connected, begged to assure the learned Attorney General that his Bill would meet with a very warm reception, and that it would be fairly and candidly considered. He concurred in what had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley), in regard to the Bill, because a very long experience and personal acquaintance with him in business matters had satisfied him that there was no person more capable than he was of forming a correct opinion on the matter of Bankruptcy Law.

MR. JESSEL, as a lawyer, could not coincide with several Gentlemen of mercantile experience who had spoken in praise of the measure. He recognized in the lucid statement of the Attorney General many features of the old Law of Bankruptcy which had to be abandoned because they had completely failed. They must recollect that the Bankruptcy Law in this country was very old. From the statute of James down to the statute of William IV. the administration of bankrupt estates was wholly in the hands of the creditors, who appointed assignees, who acted much as they thought fit, and without any official interference whatever. The result was that the place of a bankrupts' assignee became one of great profit. He recollected having heard a story of a boy who, having been asked once in a bank parlour what he would like to be, replied, "a bankrupts' assignee," and that was a class of official on whom checks must be put, if the new system was to succeed. He would not give a decided opinion upon the Bill until he saw what checks were provided in this respect. As to what lawyers called, "the order and disposition" clauses in bankruptcy, they were a law, in short, for enabling the creditors of a bankrupt to take other people's property. If a bankrupt happened to have in his possession property belonging to other people over which with their consent he exercised acts of ownership, the creditors might divide it among them. This had always appeared to him to be a scandal and an abuse. The original pretext for this law was that the bankrupt being in ostensible possession of property which had induced persons to give him credit, those persons had a right to share it. But the Judges interpreted the reason of the law to be something quite different. Moreover, the law was inconsistent, for if the owner of the property took it out of the debtor's possession before he committed an act of bankruptcy, or if the owner took it away afterwards without notice of the act of bankruptcy, the creditors had no remedy. This law had been used for the robbery of innocent and ignorant persons, and he trusted that in Committee it would be wholly swept away. Another point was, the effect of what was called a certificate of discharge. The proposal of the Attorney General, that a man's future-acquired property should not go free, was a very old one. Under the Insolvent Acts, which applied to non-traders, future property of the insolvent became liable to his old debts by an order of the court; but these provisions, as lawyers knew, were an utter failure, and therefore he could not be sanguine of the success of the present proposal in respect of traders. A provision prescribing the amount of dividend to be paid had also been tried. Under the Law of Bankruptcy which existed prior to the change in the reign of William IV. a certificate protected a bankrupt once, but, if he became bankrupt a second time, he had, in order to be protected, to pay a dividend of 15s. in the pound. Again he appealed to the experience of lawyers whether that provision ever had any practical operation. It had been found utterly useless; it did not prevent men from becoming bankrupts three or four times, nor did it enable creditors to become possessed of their after-acquired property. Great results, therefore, could not be expected from an experiment which had been tried, but which entirely failed. As to the discharge of a bankrupt, our law appeared very defective. In modern times that discharge was often illusory. Instead of being a complete discharge from all liabilities arising from contract, it was a discharge only from such liabilities as could be proved as debts under the bankruptcy. Now, in these days men incurred a vast amount of liability which could not be proved as a debt. For instance, in a recent case a bankrupt, who was an honest bankrupt, and had given up every farthing, happened to be a shareholder in several companies. They were supposed to be solvent; at all events, they were going concerns. But the assignees of the bankrupt wisely declined to take to these shares; as the law stood, the bankrupt had no means of freeing himself from them; and the result was that, within a short period of his bankruptcy two of those companies were wound up, and the official liquidator put this unlucky bankrupt on the list of contributories, and gave him the alternative of paying or of going through the Court of Bankruptcy a second time. He hoped the Attorney General would make provision for such a contingency, and would take care that all liabilities arising from contract, whether proveable under the bankruptcy or not, should be barred by the certificate of discharge, subject, of course, to any provision as to future property if the House should determine in favour of such a provision. As he understood the Bill, arrangements were to continue, but under the present law you could not have satisfactory arrangements. The trustees under the deed of arrangement did not, as regarded third parties, stand in the same position as assignees in bankruptcy. The trustees could not take advantage of a fraudulent preference against the man who had been a party to the fraudulent preference, and any Amendment and Consolidation Bill ought to provide that it should not be necessary to make a man a bankrupt in order to defeat the claim of a person who had obtained from him unfairly a preference over the other creditors. It was now necessary, in order to bring an action, to make a man a bankrupt. With regard to settlements by bankrupts, he thought the suggestion of the Attorney General a solid improvement in the law, but it should include all voluntary settlements, and extend to deeds of arrangement, the trustees of which should have the same right as assignees to call on the bankrupt to show that he was solvent when he executed the settlement. Again, it was to be hoped that the whole system of dealing with the freehold, leasehold, and copyhold estates of bankrupts—a system which was cumbrous, expensive, and annoying in the extreme—would be amended. He would not now go into details upon this point, but hereafter would suggest some clauses which he hoped the Attorney General would consider improvements and would be inclined to adopt.

MR. MUNTZ said, he thought that the remarks of the hon. and learned Member would have been more in order if the Bill had been in Committee. He rose merely to thank the Attorney General for the measure he had proposed. It would meet the wishes of a vast number of the commercial classes, and especially of a large class in the town he represented; and if it passed this Session, which he trusted it would, it would relieve the country from one of the greatest grievances of the day. The present law was nothing but cheating made easy. It was a premium on bankruptcy, and a few weeks after having passed through the court many persons were seen riding in carriages.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, expressed his thanks for the cordial co-operation which had been promised him from both sides of the House. There were only one or two points that required his attention. He had been asked how he supposed that one Judge would be able to deal with all the questions that would come before the court? His answer was, that almost all the business would be conducted by the creditors themselves, and that very little would be left to the Judge, who, he trusted, would not find much employment. It would be the duty of the Judge to exercise a general superintendence and to decide all questions of law that might be submitted to him. He had also been asked how it was proposed to deal with a bankrupt who obtained a quantity of assets immediately before his bankruptcy. Such a case would be met by the provisions of the criminal law, and when it was asked who would conduct the prosecution, he could only reply that that was a part of the great question of the appointment of a public prosecutor—a question which he hoped before long would engage the attention of the House. With respect to the opinion of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Jessel), who was entitled to speak with great authority on this subject, he believed that his hon. and learned Friend's fears, on the score of there not being sufficient check upon the trustees, were without foundation. He had adopted those checks which in the Scotch system had been attended with perfect success. One of those checks was the appointment of a committee, another was the liability of the trustee to an accountant, who would audit his accounts; and a third was his own professional character, which would, of course, be at stake. He was inclined to think with his hon. and learned Friend that voluntary settlements should be placed on the same footing as post-nuptial settlements. In conclusion, he could only add that he would thankfully avail himself of the assistance offered him by his hon. and learned Friend in reference to some clauses of the Bill.

Motion agreed to. -

Bill to consolidate and amend the Law of Bankruptcy, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

DROGHEDA WRIT.

MR. GLYN moved that Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Drogheda, in the room of Benjamin Whitworth, Esquire, whose election has been determined to be void.

COLONEL TAYLOR said, that although he had in the earlier part of the evening presented a petition from Drogheda, praying that the Writ might be suspended, and although he believed there were grounds for suspending the Writ, yet he did not think, after what had passed on the previous evening, with reference to Bewdley, that he should serve any useful purpose by opposing the Motion. There did not appear, in the present state of the law, to be any precedent for directing a Commission to issue in cases where the only grounds of rendering an election void were violence and intimidation. It was to be hoped that in any alteration of the law, such as had been suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Vernon Harcourt), provision would be made to meet the case of elections which had been disgraced by such scenes as those which had characterized the late election at Drogheda.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. SULLIVAN) said, that after a careful perusal of the evidence concerning the late election at Drogheda, he had failed to discover the slightest reason which would warrant the suspension of the Writ. The election had been set aside on the ground that certain outrages, interfering with the freedom of election, were committed on the day of polling by a mob in a certain quarter of the borough. That, however, was not such a system of intimidation as was likely to interfere with the freedom of election in the future. He regretted, therefore, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Taylor) should have made the observations which had just fallen from him.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he found sufficient justification for the remarks of his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Taylor) in the Report of the Judge, who stated that a system of intimidation was organized and carried out in the late election, that such system of intimidation was subversive of the freedom of election, and that outrages were committed which were calculated to deter, and which did deter, some of the electors from recording their votes.

EASTER HOLIDAYS.—NOTICE:
HUDSON'S BAY TERRITORY.

QUESTION.

LORD CAIRNS thought it would be convenient to their Lordships if the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) were able to inform them what proposal he intended to make as to the date and duration of the Easter recess. The noble Earl would perhaps allow him also to put a Question as to another subject—namely, Whether any progress had been made in the negotiations between the Canadian Government and the Hudson's Bay Company?

EARL GRANVILLE had to state, in answer to the first Question of the noble and learned Lord, that the House of Commons had come to the laudable resolution, in consideration of the pressure of Public Business, to shorten the usual duration of the Easter holidays. But although he believed there had this year been more work and more discussion in their Lordships' House than customary at this early period of the Session, they could not be said to be overwhelmed with business. He therefore intended to propose the usual adjournment, which would be from Friday, the 19th of March, to Monday, the 5th of April.

With regard to the noble and learned Lord's second Question, the negotiations between the Canadian Government and the Hudson's Bay Company had been under his attention ever since he had had the honour of being at the head of the Colonial Office, and he had had repeated interviews with the Canadian delegates and with the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Company. At one time, he must say he felt perfectly hopeless of arriving at any amicable arrangement, the views of the two parties being so conflicting. But he had to-day sent a final proposal to each of them. He could not, of course, tell what the result would be, but he trusted that their good sense and moderation would induce them to accept it. At the same time, their Lordships must be aware that a scheme which was intended to reconcile the claims of two contending bodies must partake of the character of a compromise, and must, to some extent, be unpalatable to both of them.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY wished to know, Whether the noble Earl (Earl Granville), could fix any day for moving the appointment of the Joint Committee to consider the best mode of transacting the Public Business, to which reference was made last week?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he would answer the noble Marquess's Question to-morrow.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had stated the other night, and was still of opinion, that the object in view could be better carried out by a Standing Order than by a Bill, and he had therefore prepared a draft of a Standing Order, which he should be happy to submit to their Lordships. It would carry out the noble Marquess's intentions, though in a somewhat different manner. He thought it desirable that the resumption of a Bill should commence in the House where it had been originally introduced, and what he proposed was that it should be competent for any Member of the House, not later than ten days after the meeting of Parliament, to give not less than a week's nor more than a fortnight's Notice of a Motion, to suspend the Standing Orders in relation to any Public Bill which shall have passed that House, and not have been rejected by the other during the previous Session; and if that Motion be agreed to, that afterwards the Question that such Bill do pass shall be put and declared to be carried without further debate being allowed. The result of such a Motion would be that the Bill would be sent up to their Lordships, or sent down to the Commons, as the case might be, to be dealt with as if it had passed through the usual stages; it being provided that it should be returned to the other House, whether it had been amended or not, in order that that House might retain its hold of the Bill. The Bill would thus be taken up at the commencement of the Session, and each House would have reserved to it its proper jurisdiction. To proceed by Standing Orders would allow more freedom than if the matter was regulated by statute.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he found on inquiry, that a Bill could not be formally referred to a Joint Committee unless it had been before both Houses; but he had no doubt the Joint Committee, if one should be appointed, would nevertheless, give as much consideration to the measure as if it had been formally referred to them.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had received a communication from the noble Viscount (Viscount Eversley), the late Speaker of the House of Commons, suggesting a plan by which the object in view could be carried out by a Standing Order with the consent of both Houses. He thought it would be better to take no action in the matter until the Members of the Government in this House had had an opportunity of conferring with their Colleagues as to what plan was likely to prove acceptable to both Houses; and he hoped, therefore, the noble Marquess and the noble Lord, the Chairman of Committees, would not at present press their proposals. His noble Friend (Viscount Eversley), did not wish to bring forward his scheme formally, but it might, together with that of the noble Lord, be placed in the hands of the Government, that they might confer as to how the object in view could be best attained.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that this Bill involved some important principles.

In consequence of the position which he had the honour to fill in the University of Oxford, he had been consulted by both the promoters and opponents of the measure, had heard both sides, and had endeavoured to form an impartial judgment upon its merits. He was sorry to say that this was a case in which a house was divided against itself, the promoters being the junior Fellows of Oriol College, and the Principal, though not the only, opponent being the Provost of that College. In justice to the Provost it should be understood that his opposition was based entirely on public considerations, for the Bill would not come into operation until the next avoidance of his office, and personally he would not be in the slightest degree affected by it. There were no means of knowing precisely the emoluments at present enjoyed by the Provost in his academical capacity; but he believed he might say they did not exceed £500 a year—a sum which their Lordships would certainly deem utterly inadequate to maintain the proper position of a gentleman placed at the head of one of the most distinguished Colleges in Oxford. But in the reign of Queen Anne an Act was passed annexing to the provostship a canonry in Rochester Cathedral, on the avowed ground of the inadequacy of the College income to maintain his position; and in the reign of George III. another Act was passed—he presumed on the same ground—annexing to it likewise the rectory of Purleigh, in Essex. The present Bill proposed to deprive the Provost of these annexations. The two preferments, it seemed to him, stood on distinct grounds. Purleigh was a large agricultural parish, containing between 3,000 and 4,000 acres, and a population of about 1,000, and it was obvious that the parochial duties of such a rectory could not be discharged by the head of a College at Oxford, filling at the same time the office of a canon of Rochester, but must be intrusted to the exclusive care of a curate, on such a salary as the Provost might allow. The living, according to the Bill, was of the net value of £1,200 per annum, after defraying the expenses of the curate in charge; but, according to the Clergy List, the gross income, after deducting the salary of a curate, was only £1,141. As to the canonry, he saw no objection in point of principle to its retention by the Provost, for his academical duties were not such as to render it difficult for him to discharge the duties of a canon in residence during three months of the year. The Bill, however, proposed—he would not say to disestablish and disendow, although those terms had lately been much in vogue—but to disannex both the rectory and the canonry, and to effect an exchange, to be sanctioned of course by Parliament and by the Crown. The canonry it was proposed to exchange either with the Crown or the Bishop of the diocese for a living or livings of equal value, to be placed in the hands of the Provost and Fellows, and to be disposed of in the same manner as the other patronage of the College, subject to the proviso that the Provost should be expressly debarred from receiving such living. Practically, therefore, the Fellows would purchase ecclesiastical preferments. Now he felt bound to say that of all modes of ecclesiastical patronage that of Colleges was the most objectionable—and he said this without any disrespect—because practically they could exercise no option. Every living at the disposal of a College was usually offered to the senior Fellow, and he, if it was a good one, accepted it, while if not he rejected it, and it was then offered to the other Fellows according to seniority, till it was accepted by the one who thought he had the least chance of getting anything better. The consequence was that then there was no opportunity of preferring any person “extern” to the College to any living which any Fellow of the College thought it worth while to take himself. Practically then there was no option on the part of the nominal patrons, and he had certainly known cases in which the nominations made had been a scandal to the Church, and for which the only excuse had been that there was no option but to offer it to each Fellow in succession. There was a provision in the Bill that after sanction had been given to the exchange of the canonry for a rectory, or other preferment, it should be competent for the College to allot such a sum as they might deem necessary as compensation to the Provost for the alienation of the canonry. The object of the measure, as distinctly stated in the Preamble and in the first clause, was to enable a layman to be appointed to the Provostship of Oriol College. He believed there was at present no distinct prohibition of this, but the emoluments being mostly of an ecclesiastical character it was virtually necessary that a clergyman should be appointed. Now he did not object in principle to the alienation of the canonry and rectory which had formerly been annexed to the Provostship, but the Bill proposed that £900 out of the £1,100 or £1,200 which the rectory produced should be taken away from the rector and paid as compensation to the Provost, who would no longer have the slightest connection with the living. This arrangement seemed to him open to objection. While not wishing, then, to oppose the second reading, he thought there were questions involved in the Bill which called for the consideration of the House and the Government, and it would, he hoped, be carefully considered by the Select Committee to which it would be sent.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he was glad that the Bill had not been read a second time sub silentio. But for the fact that the canonry and rectory had been given by Act of Parliament, and could not, consequently, be dealt with under the provisions of the Act of 1854, the College would, in the ordinary course, have applied to the visitor, whose office for several centuries had been exercised by the Crown, and the case would have been heard by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, from whom it would, he was sure, have received the most careful consideration. He hoped the scheme would not meet with a smaller measure of attention than would in that case have been given to it. The object of the Bill, as the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had explained, was to enable the Fellows of the College to elect a layman as Provost if they thought fit. Whether that change was a desirable one he would not now discuss; but it might fairly be said that a clerical Provost could do everything that a lay Provost could; whereas there were some functions affecting the internal government and religious services of the College which a layman could not discharge. Still, it might be desirable not to fetter the discretion of the Fellows in this matter. He agreed, however, with the noble Earl that the mode in which it was proposed to carry out the exchange and to provide an endowment for the lay Provost was very objectionable. He did not know that he could go quite so far as the noble earl in his objection to the exercise of collegiate patronage. As long as Colleges could present young Fellows, they usually sent very useful clergymen; but the misfortune was, that the best livings were generally waited for by Fellows who had passed their period of activity, and often had no experience of parish work till a time when they had ceased to be fit for it. Instead of alienating from future rectors almost the whole of the endowment, he should prefer the sale of the advowson altogether, and the application of the proceeds to the endowment of the provostship. He trusted that the Bill would receive very careful consideration.

LORD REDESDALE said, he thought it was important to consider the propriety of altering the fundamental constitution of a College by a Private Bill. Such a proceeding he thought extremely dangerous. He was obliged to watch every Session against attempts to accomplish by private legislation objects which were of public importance; and, unless the practice was checked, the greatest mischief and confusion would arise. Power was given in cases like this to the Privy Council, the Orders being then subject to the confirmation of Parliament, and this was the proper course to be pursued.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was not competent to enter upon the question as to whether the Bill should or should not have been introduced as a Private Bill; but certainly, whether this was a subject for private or public legislation, advantage had arisen from the Bill being placed by the noble Lord (Redesdale) among the Notices of Public Business. He understood the living of Purleigh was of larger value than had been stated by the noble Earl, the amount being £1,800. The object of the Bill seemed to him clearly a good one, for it could not be desirable that the head of a College should derive his income from a rectory at a considerable distance from Oxford, and from a canonry which was also distant. Whether Colleges were good patrons of livings was a question which he must leave to be discussed by the noble Earl and right rev. Bishop; but with regard to canonries he thought the Crown was a much better patron than for livings. As to the Provost being a layman, the wisest course surely was to allow the option, in order that the fittest man might be selected, whether lay or clerical. The remarks which had been made would, no doubt, lead to a very careful consideration of the details of the Bill by the Select Committee.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN ENGLAND, IRELAND, AND SCOTLAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, in calling attention to the accounts of the sums voted by Parliament for Public Education in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and to the Reports of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland for 1866 and 1867, it may be convenient to state what are the subjects to which I shall not call the attention of the House. I will, first of all, premise that I have no intention to question the propriety of the decision of Her Majesty's Government not to introduce any great measure on the subject of education for England and Wales in the present year, and next that I do not propose to refer to Scotland, for I am satisfied by the statement which has been so ably laid before you by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India (the Duke of Argyll) that the education of Scotland is placed upon a firm basis, and that the improvements recommended by my noble Friend will prove beneficial. But it is obvious that the question of education in England and Wales and also in Ireland must attract your Lordship's attention next Session, and it is advisable that we should know exactly where we stand and in what direction we ought to proceed. I may, in the first place, state that the present system of grants—if it can be called a system—originated in 1839; when the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Salisbury, on the part of the Church of England, with Lord Lansdowne, then President of the Council, and myself, at that time Secretary of State for the Home Department, agreed upon certain conditions on which grants should be made by Parliament for educational purposes. The Bishops, it was then arranged, were to be consenting parties to the appointment of inspectors for National or Church Schools in England and Wales, and the reports as to religious instruction were to be made to them in the first instance; while with regard to other denominations, assistance was to be given them for both secular and religious education; but no inquiry was to be made and no interference to be attempted with respect to the religious instruction. The only society to be assisted by grants, not denominational, was the British and Foreign School Society, which taught Christianity pure and simple, without any catechism or formularies. Now, that system, it is obvious, depended upon local resources, and on the aid given by the National Society and other institutions, and did not depend primarily on Parliamentary grants. I was curious to see what proportion of the funds, during the last ten years, had been derived from local subscriptions and school-pence, and what proportion from grants out of the public revenues. Well, I find by the Returns for England and Wales—for none have been yet issued for Ireland—that about two-fifths or 40 per cent is the proportion which has been derived from Parliamentary Grants, and three-fifths, or 60 per cent has been derived from local resources. In 1868, out of a total of £1,604,978 £583,794 came from the Treasury, and £1,021,184 from local sources; while in the ten years 1859-68, out of a total of £15,061,640, £6,070,135 came from Parliamentary grants, the remaining £8,991,405 coming from local sources. It is obvious from this Return that the conditions agreed to by Parliament were conditions depending in a very great degree on local sources—upon the willingness of residents to give subscriptions, and on the amount to be derived from the payments of the parents. It was not a State scheme of education originated by Parliament, but a plan of giving aid and assistance to local efforts and to the exertions of the Church of England, the various Dissenting bodies, and the British and Foreign School Society. That is, of course, quite different from a State plan of education. Looking back over the length of time during which that scheme has been in operation—about thirty years—it strikes me that while great good has been effected by the increased spread of education, and more especially by its improved quality, it cannot be said that the plan has been a success as regards the general education of the country. Comparing England with other countries, both in Europe and America, such as Prussia and Saxony, and the New England States, or even with Scotland or Ireland, education in England is not generally and universally spread among the people. Instances in proof of this have lately been given, both by individuals and from public sources of information. A gentleman, whom I have the pleasure of knowing, the Rev. Canon Girdlestone, vicar of a parish in North Devon, lately addressed a letter to The Times, in which he said that he had a school in his parish, which cost £130, having 130 children, and, therefore, very cheaply conducted; but that only £25 could be raised by local subscriptions, about £24 17s. was derived from school-pence, and £56 from the Parliamentary Grant, he being himself obliged to supply the remaining £22 or £23 from his own resources. The living was what would ordinarily be called a good one, but it was subject to very heavy charges in the shape of poor rates and other burdens; and Mr. Girdlestone naturally described as a very great hardship on him, that in a parish, the valuation of which was £15,000 a year, he could collect no more than £25 in local subscriptions for the school. I have since seen Mr. Girdlestone, and he informed me that since his letter appeared in The Times he has had many communications, and that in particular the secretary or treasurer of a charity—Belton's Charity—which assists schools of the Church of England with small subscriptions of £5 or £10 each, had informed him that the complaint among the clergy is general. They say they cannot find willing subscribers among the landowners, and are obliged to contribute very largely in proportion to their resources in order to keep up their schools. I feel for them, for I must say that the conduct of the parochial clergy of the Church of England has been most admirable. They have subscribed to the utmost of their means for the promotion of education, solely, as I believe, from a desire to make their parishioners better men and better Christians, and for the general welfare of society. Having thus exerted themselves, it is very hard that so great a proportion of the burden should be cast on them. I have other information as to the unwillingness to subscribe. A return has been sent me by another gentleman, with whom also I am acquainted, the Rev. William Beal, vicar of Brooke, near Norwich, who has made inquiry among the Boards of Guardians in Norfolk as to the aid given to a particular class of paupers—children between five and fifteen years of age. An Act was passed, not many years ago, called Denison's Act, because it was introduced, I believe, by the present Speaker of the House of Commons, which enables Boards of Guardians to give relief in the matter of education by sending children who receive out-door relief to school and paying for their instruction. Going through the thirty-three unions of Norfolk, Mr. Beal finds that only five unions have adopted that Act in any degree, and one or two give scarcely any assistance—that the King's Lynn Union is the worst in the county, and that there is great unwillingness to put the Act in force. Mr. Beal has calculated the expense which would be involved, and he states that the education of the pauper children in Norfolk—upwards of 3,000 in number—in many unions would not exceed half a quarter of a farthing in the pound, and in others would be only half a farthing, while there is only one where it would exceed a half-penny in the pound. Now that is a striking proof of the general unwillingness of the landowners and farmers of the country to promote education, notwithstanding that the Committee of Council have issued Orders which would enable them easily to do so. Mr. Girdlestone, indeed, states that two-thirds of the country are without schools. Possibly there may be some exaggeration in that estimate, but the general effect of the existing practice is that the country is dotted about with very good schools, well managed, with able masters and mistresses, while in a great part of the country there are no schools whatever, or only dame schools of a miserable description. Such being the case, I am persuaded that it will be necessary next year for the Government and for Parliament to establish a good and general system of education in England and Wales. I do not want to enter into the vexed question of rating, but I am glad to see that the Prime Minister has declared the intention of himself and his Colleagues—when the very heavy business now before them and other pressing affairs have been disposed of—to undertake the consideration of the whole question, and to endeavour to base taxation on principles of equity for the welfare of the whole community. Upon their decision on the question of local rating must in a great measure depend the solution of this question of national education. If it should be thought proper to continue the present amount of rating—which I trust will not be the case—it will be hopeless to expect fresh rates to be imposed and accepted for the purpose of education; but if the rating for certain objects, such as gaols and police, should be greatly diminished, it may be very possible to have rates for educational purposes. In the former case it would, I think, be necessary to provide, as in Ireland, sufficient funds from Parliamentary Grants for a general system of education, thereby relieving large numbers of persons who are now willing subscribers and placing the burden, where it ought to be placed, on the willing and the unwilling alike. There are two great questions connected with education—the one relating to the financial part, the other relating to religious instruction. With regard to the latter, I do not think there would be any great difficulty, for with a system of rating, it would be possible to give the control to the ratepayers, while with a system of public grants it would be the right of the State to maintain some control over the schools to be established. It would be right, also, to consider the case of those who have subscribed largely for many years and ought not to lose all the power over the school which was originally allowed them. It is a matter of contract with them, and for a certain time at least they should be allowed to retain some power. The rule should be nearly the same as that which exists in Ireland, where the situation is totally different from what it is in England. There is a considerable demand in Ireland for the substitution of denominational education for the present system. Now, that depends in a great degree on the financial question. If people who advance, as in England, three-fifths, or 12s. in the pound, ask the State for aid, it is only reasonable that they should expect a certain power over the management of the school, and should give directions as to the religious instruction to be given therein; but in Ireland, according to the Reports of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland for 1866 and 1867, I find that the local subscriptions and school-pence only amount to about 7 per cent. 93 per cent. being contributed by the State. For people, therefore, who raise only 3s. in the pound themselves, and ask for the remaining 17s. from the State, to demand that the schools shall be entirely subject to their control and conditions is by no means reasonable. In Ireland, according to a plan first proposed by the late Lord Monteagle, and set on foot by a noble Lord opposite (Earl Derby) the rules and regulations of the National Board provide that the religious instruction shall be at separate hours, either before or after the secular instruction, and that every parent may withdraw his child from it if he desires to do so, a board being put up to announce the hour for such religious instruction. Parents may thus withdraw their children, whether few or many, and may obtain from the clergyman of the parish, if they are Protestants, or from the priest, if Roman Catholics, such religious instruction as is in accordance with their belief. That is a great security. But the Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland have proposed that with regard to all schools containing no Protestant children, and to other schools which contain 24,000 Protestant children, they should be allowed the entire direction of the education, so as to have Roman Catholic emblems in the schools, and to have the education conducted entirely according to their own views. Now, it seems to me that, by this scheme it would be in the power of the Roman Catholic body directing the education either to make proselytes of the Protestant children, who would be obliged to bow and do reverence to those emblems, or to drive them out of the schools where they are now educated. These evils are very forcibly pointed out by the Board of National Education in their Reports for 1866 and 1867; and I hold in my hand, an opinion, in which I entirely agree, given by Archbishop Whately in 1843, when the system was much younger than at present, as to what would be the result of separate grants. Archbishop Whately said:—

“Now, what would be the result of this system of separate grants of, suppose, £7,000 or £8,000 to Protestant schools, and £70,000 or £80,000 to Roman Catholics? In those numerous districts of the South of Ireland where there are in each school not above five or six Protestant children to, perhaps, 80 or 100 Roman Catholics—from the smallness of the proportion of poor Protestants to the population—these poor children would either remain untaught, or, more likely, go to schools under the unrestricted control of Roman Catholics; and throughout Ireland the far greater part of the Roman Catholic population would be brought up in a system, it is to be feared, of bigoted jealousy against the Church, and alienation from their Protestant fellow subjects."

Now, with regard to "bigoted jealousy against the Church," we in England at this time need not be very anxious on that score; but with regard to "alienation from their Protestant fellow-subjects," it would be one of the greatest evils you could inflict upon Ireland. In short, it seems to me that, whereas, since 1829, we have been endeavouring by every means in our power to unite Roman Catholics and Protestants in the same education and in the same pursuits, with a view to diminish and finally destroy those feelings of alienation and ill-will which have so long been the curse of Ireland, I cannot conceive a mode in which the alienation and the ill-will could more certainly be revived than by having a separate denominational system of education introduced into Ireland. Much as I shall rejoice to see that system of tyranny and oppression called Protestant ascendancy put an end to in Ireland, I should not rejoice if I thought that Roman Catholic ascendancy was going to be established and to be accompanied with oppression of Protestants. I have nothing more to say than to impress upon the House that a more general system of education ought to be established in England, and I look forward with great anxiety to the measures which may be proposed for that purpose. I hope that when a measure is brought forward it will be as complete and as clear as the Government measure lately explained to Parliament and the country.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON: None of your Lordships will have been surprised that my noble Friend, who for so many years has devoted so much attention to this subject, has brought it under your Lordships' notice; and I am exceedingly glad to find that the noble Earl does not blame Her Majesty's Government for not undertaking to deal with this matter by legislation in the course of the present Session. I am not surprised that my noble Friend acquits us of blame, because no one is better acquainted than he is with the magnitude and importance of the question; and I am confident that if it is to be dealt with by legislation it is necessary that it should be at a time when Parliament can give to it that large share of its attention which the importance of the question demands, and which could not be accorded during the present Session. It would have been very ill-advised on the part of the Government to bring forward a measure on this subject without a fair prospect of having it fully discussed in both Houses of Parliament and passed into law; and therefore it was, though with considerable regret, that Her Majesty's Government determined that it would be their duty not to deal with the general question of education during the present Session. Although I regret the necessity for postponing a measure which I admit to be to a considerable extent urgent, I am not sorry that delay will afford my right hon. Colleague and myself an opportunity of considering the question in all its bearings. Under these circumstances, my noble Friend will not expect that I should now declare to the House in detail what are likely to be the views of Her Majesty's Government upon this question. I agree with my noble Friend that there is ample evidence to show that the present educational arrangements in England are not altogether such as we could desire them to be. I believe that there are large portions of the population in our great towns whom our system of education very inadequately reaches. I believe that there are also portions of the country in the rural districts where, from the very nature of the system and the principle upon which it rests—that of aiding only those who aid themselves—it has a very limited application, and where it does not meet the real and just requirements of the country. At the same time, I think my noble Friend spoke in perhaps somewhat too disparaging a tone of the effect of the present system and of the great work which it is doing. With respect to the present state of matters, I have some details of a later date than those on your Lordships' table, and they show that the present system, imperfect as it is, is extending year by year in usefulness. The number of schools inspected in England, Wales, and Scotland in the year 1868 was 15,572, being an increase on the previous year of 981; the number of children present at inspection was

1,527,665, being an increase of 136,565; the average annual number attending was 1,241,780, which shows an increase of 94,317; the number of certificated teachers was 13,387, showing an increase of 774; the number of assistant-teachers was 1,279, being an increase of 76; and the number of pupil-teachers was 13,185, being an increase of 1,668. Now a system which provides education under the stringent regulations of the Privy Council, and under strict inspection, for an average attendance of 1,241,780 children, is a system which is doing a good work in the country, and which—whatever arrangements we may make ultimately—we ought not hastily or rashly to interfere with. It is one of the difficulties of this question that we have at work in this country at the present time so many and such various educational appliances. My own feeling is that, so far as they require to be supplemented in order to meet the wants of the country, supplemented they ought to be; but it would be unwise on the part of the Government or Parliament to throw aside or to waste any of those means of education which are now at the disposal of the country. A Return which lies upon your Lordships' Table shows how large an amount in England and Scotland was derived from two sources, distinct from the Government Grant—private subscriptions and school-pence. You may divide the income of these schools, not quite, but almost equally into three parts—the Government grant, voluntary contributions, and school-pence. In the latter there has been a steady increase during the last ten years. In 1859 in England and Wales the school-pence amounted to £229,000, and in 1868 to £430,000. During the same period voluntary subscriptions have fluctuated in amount, being sometimes more and sometimes less; but I am glad to say that at present the income derived from voluntary subscriptions is the highest received during the last ten years, or, I believe, at any previous time in the history of education. That is ample proof that there is a deep interest felt in this question by all classes in the country, and that those who have the means are not inclined to disregard their duties in respect to it. My noble Friend (Earl Russell) has, indeed, pointed out that there are many cases—and they are far too many—in which the burden of voluntary subscriptions and contributions to education is practically cast upon the clergy; but, although that is true in too many cases, I am confident my noble Friend will be the first to admit that there are in other instances very marked exceptions to the description he has given, and that there are many landowners in this country fully alive to their obligations in this respect, who subscribe munificently to educational objects. It is to be observed that the sum put down in the column as derived from subscriptions is intended to represent, as far as we are able, only the annual fixed subscriptions to different schools; and the sums which are contributed in many cases—sometimes by a clergyman, sometimes by a landlord—to make up a deficit at the end of the year fall under the heading of "other sources" in this particular Return; so that £500,000 of subscriptions represents pretty well £500,000 of regular and permanent income. With respect to that portion of the subject which relates to Ireland, on which the noble Earl has touched, it is not my intention to enter into any details at present, for, as my noble Friend knows, it is now being considered by a Royal Commission. My noble Friend has asked me why the Returns from Ireland have not yet been laid upon the table of the House. My noble Friend should remember that it takes longer to get Returns from Ireland than it does from this country. The Department with which I have the honour to be connected is not responsible for the delay; but I am pleased to be able to state that the Returns to which my noble Friend referred have been laid upon the table this evening, and will, I trust, by tomorrow or the next day be in your Lordships' hands. There is no doubt that when they are examined those Returns will prove the accuracy of the description given by my noble Friend. The main burden of education in Ireland is borne by the State, and the major portion of the remaining funds is derived from the school-pence, the amount realized from voluntary assistance being absolutely insignificant. Under these circumstances, I can only say in conclusion, as I began, that the subject will receive the fullest consideration at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. As your Lordships know, the matter has been inquired into by various Commissions and Committees, and it will be our duty—and from the great interest I feel in the question it will to me be a labour of love—to devote ourselves to the consideration of the facts developed in the course of these inquiries, with a view, not to overturn the system which already exists and does its work well, but to supplement it where it is imperfect, with the object, as far as possible, of bringing the means of education within the reach of the labouring population.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: It was with considerable gratification, my Lords, that I heard the noble Earl the President of the Privy Council state his high appreciation of the work of national education as now administered by the Department over which he presides, and I cannot but think that my noble Friend, the more he sees of that system, which has now been administered by the Privy Council for nearly thirty years, the more he will find the advantages of the system in calling forth the voluntary efforts of the country, and in maintaining what has contributed so much to the religious education of the people—the denominational system. As to the complaints that are made of the educational deficiencies in this country, I believe it will always be found that the investigations have proceeded on erroneous data, and almost all the conclusions arrived at have been drawn solely from the knowledge within the reach of the public office, which is, of course, confined to the schools in receipt of annual grants. But that is a very inadequate view of the extent of educational movement in this country. It must be always borne in mind that there is an enormous amount of education conducted by voluntary societies—by persons who do not bring themselves under the control of Government by submitting to the receipt of grants, and this fact is generally lost sight of, or very inadequately appreciated. I hold in my hand a Return which I moved for at the end of last Session, and which resulted from the labours of the National Society. They have a decennial examination into the state of Church of England education throughout the country. I find in the Return which has only recently been printed, that out of a total of £8,991,405 expended in England and Wales in the course of ten years upon education, no less than £4,554,333 has been the result of voluntary subscriptions. While, too, I find this remarkable result on the face of the Return, I find also that from a total of 11,261 Church of England schools which have been included in the Return of those paid by the National Society, the number of those receiving aid from Parliamentary grants was 4,690, and the number that are not receiving Parliamentary aid is 6,571. When we think of the amount of voluntary effort which is represented by these subscriptions, which amounted in 1868 to £499,782, as regards schools receiving Parliamentary aid, what must be the amount of voluntary effort which exists in the Church of England when we find that there are 6,571 schools actually in operation, and attended by a large number of scholars, of which no notice is taken by the public office? Very little of this educational effort is shewn in the educational papers. In addition to that there is a large number of schools which belong to Nonconforming bodies, and which, when I had the honour of filling the office now held by the noble Earl opposite, were gradually perceiving the advantage of the assistance derived from the annual grants. For a long time there has been on the part of these bodies, what I cannot but look upon, to some extent, as a sentimental objection—not because the religious instruction they gave might be interfered with by the Government, but recognizing as they did the necessity of religious instruction—they had a sentimental objection to availing themselves of any assistance from the public funds. I am happy to say that, owing to the representations that were made, those objections had greatly decreased before the late Government went out of Office, and the great part of the increase in the number of schools receiving the grant, and of scholars under examination, is due to the removal of those objections; for the Nonconformist bodies are now beginning to feel the advantages that are to be derived from the public grants, and the disadvantages to which they have hitherto been put for the want of them. It is because I should be very sorry to see any steps interposed by the Government of the day which would at all imperil the success attending voluntary efforts, which are of the greatest importance to the religious education of the country, and to the denominational system upon which I believe so much of the religious education of the country is founded and based—it is because I should deprecate any State interference in that direction, that I hope Her Majesty's Government will remember, in any measure they may propose, that they are dealing with a matter of the highest importance to the country, and refrain from doing anything which may imperil a system which has been attended with such beneficial results.

LORD LYVEDEN rose to corroborate what had been stated by the noble Earl (Earl Russell) who introduced this question, as to the great indifference with which education was regarded by the agricultural classes. A meeting was held not long ago in the county in which he resided on this subject of education. Unfortunately, the Chairman put the question before the meeting, which comprised all classes, in the interrogative form—"Are you content with the present state of education, and with its results?"—and the cry came back from the agriculturists—"Yes, yes, quite;" and the reason was that they thought though education was of direct service to the manufacturing classes, in the agricultural counties education might be a pleasure to those who received it, but it was of very little advantage to them—it did not help them to get on in the world. Another reason of the indifference with which education was regarded by the farmers was this—that though it might be an advantage it had not been shown to tend to the diminution of crime. This was a very important subject. He wished his noble Friend had been able to bring forward some Returns tending to show that the decrease of crime corresponded with the increase of education. If he had any Returns to show that, the sooner he could put them into circulation the better, for he believed that one great reason why the farmers depreciated education was, that they did not see how the increase of education tended to the suppression of crime. In the preparation of any scheme for a general system of education, he hoped his noble Friend would never resort to a compulsory rate. Far from increasing education, he believed such a course would greatly tend to diminish it, for it would make the whole subject most unpopular, especially among the agricultural classes. He made these remarks on the state of feeling in the midland counties but must not be supposed to be in any way himself unfavourable to the progress of education.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am afraid that my noble Friend's greed for Returns has led him in this instance to ask for a Return which, when obtained, will be of very little service to him. I agree with the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lyveden), that not only has crime not decreased in proportion as education has increased, but I am afraid that an inquiry into the matter will reveal some awkward figures the other way. At one of the quarter sessions in my county the other day, the chief constable not only maintained that crime had increased in the county during the last ten years, but that it had increased very nearly in proportion to the spread of education. My Lords, I never could see myself what possible connection there is between the diminution of crime and the spread of education. Education does not alter a man's nature. You may alter the nature of the crime; you may change the paths by which the criminal will proceed; but crime is a consequence of moral depravity, and the mode in which it will be committed will be a matter of calculation with the criminal, no matter what the amount of education that may be given in your national schools. You cannot alter his nature, but you may give him more power, and greater skill in selecting the means by which he can pursue a course of crime with the greatest effect. The one way to diminish crime is to diminish pauperism; and I believe that, by the spread of education, pauperism may be very greatly diminished among the agricultural population. Every one must know that in respect of availing himself of opportunities the agricultural labourer is utterly helpless. He is utterly incapable of making use of any chance of bettering himself which may be presented to him, and consequently he remains in his low social position. Until we have a more general system of education you will never be able to induce him to help himself. But I must say I quite concur with my noble Friend (Lord Lyveden) in asking the Government to pause and consider before they make up their mind to introduce a general system of education based on general taxation. I am not insensible to the deficiencies of the present system; but I think the noble Earl opposite was rather hard against the landowners—to represent them as being opposed to the spread of education is somewhat hard; but I think matters would be still worse if only a limited area of the wealth of the country were made responsible. The noble Earl (Earl Russell) stated the case of King's Lynn, and of a parish there in which he thought the guardians were singularly insensible of the value of education. Now I know nothing of King's Lynn except that it is a port. Being a port and nothing else it derives its wealth from its harbour. Its property is centred in ships. What hope, therefore, have the guardians of raising a rate from the wealth of King's Lynn, seeing that if they make a rate for the purposes of education they must assess it on the same basis as that on which similar rates are assessed in other parts of the country? They cannot levy a rate on ships, and they may not like to throw what they would regard as an undue pressure on land, and where they see the rate operating so unfairly they would naturally grudge every additional farthing to be added to the rates. That very place, King's Lynn, would appear to me to afford an illustration of the danger which the Government would have to face in adopting anything like a general rate for the purposes of education. This is a point to which the Government must look in any reform of local taxation. At present you have no equality in local taxation—I doubt whether you can have it—but I should be glad to see the introduction of such a system of assessment as would make those five-sixths of the wealth of the country which now escape liable for that contribution to that taxation of which they ought to bear their share. But if in addition to the other burdens which land has now to bear you assume that it should also bear the expenses of national education, you will create a spirit of resistance which will secure for your system an amount of unpopularity which no improvement you may make in education will be able to counterbalance. I do not know what scheme may be floating in the mind of my noble Friend the President of the Council; but I do know that to a great extent the Government have pledged themselves to the principle of rating, and therefore I would ask my noble Friend to remember two things.

First, that the moment you appeal to rates you kill voluntary subscriptions. People when rated for national schools will no more think of supporting a school by voluntary subscription than they would think of maintaining a workhouse by voluntary subscription. In the next place, I would ask him to remember that you cannot increase an already too heavy burden of taxation on one class without creating a feeling of distrust and a sense of wrong in the minds of those whom you wish to co-operate with you. For myself, I must say that I view with much suspicion any system of education based on anything like compulsory rating, unless the Government have first seen their way to removing the anomalies and the injustice now existing in respect of the taxation imposed on property, in which I include houses as well as land. I earnestly hope my noble Friend will take these matters into consideration before introducing his Bill. However great its other merits may be such a measure would have the effect of destroying a system of voluntary munificence, and that not from the richest class, such as no other country in the world has ever seen. If the Government were to frame any scheme which would have the effect of destroying this system, they will discourage allies whom they can never replace, and they will introduce a feeling of hatred and disgust on the subject which will effectually prevent all co-operation on the subject of education, until its promoters will be driven to find the whole funds for education out of Imperial taxation.

EARL GREY: I must protest against the statement of my noble Friend (Lord Lyveden) who drew his illustration from Northamptonshire, being supposed to be a correct representation of the feeling of the agricultural population in regard of education, and the invidious distinction he drew in this respect between the agricultural and manufacturing districts. It may be true that in my noble Friend's part of the country there is an indifference to education, that the proprietors and farmers may be indisposed to encourage it, and that the labourer may not find his material prosperity advanced by it; but I can only say that if this is a correct account of what exists in Northamptonshire it is totally unlike the state of things I have had the happiness to know in the north of England. In the north of England, the desire to promote education is general on the part of the proprietors and occupiers of land, and the desire to obtain education is still more general among the working population. I need only refer to the interesting Report of Mr. Henley, one of the Assistant Commissioners for Inquiry into the employment of women and children in agriculture, which has lately been laid before Parliament. The Report I refer to shows that among the population of the north, education is practically universal. For myself, I can say I never remember seeing in Northumberland an agricultural labourer who could not read and write; and, as a general rule, they are highly intelligent, as all who know them will bear witness. The farmers are quite well aware that their own interests are promoted by having labourers of intelligence and some amount of education. They have largely availed themselves of machinery, the introduction of which is greatly facilitated by the intelligence of the labouring men, who, on their part, find that their education helps them to better places and better pay. That being the state of things among agriculturists in the part of the north of England with which I am acquainted, where I believe the population to be more generally and better educated than they are in our great commercial and manufacturing towns, I must protest against the invidious distinction sought to be drawn between the agricultural and the manufacturing districts.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: My Lords, it seems to be generally supposed that the extent of education is to be measured by the Returns of the Privy Council. But the only schools which appear on the books of the Privy Council, and consequently only those which appear in their Returns, are schools which receive Government aid in some form or other. But beyond these there is a large number of schools of which, for various reasons, the Privy Council takes no cognizance. Now, my Lords, though I am not prepared to contend that a great many of these are not very indifferent schools, and although I have often regretted to see benevolent persons wasting their money upon them, I know that, on the other hand, some of the schools not under the Privy Council are very satisfactory schools indeed. Beyond Government inspection

there is spread over the country a system of diocesan inspection which was far from inefficient in the diocese with which I was recently connected. In that diocese, last year, 311 schools underwent diocesan inspection; and that not in a cursory manner, for the Government forms were used, and the returns were made almost in exactly the same form and character as those returned to the Council Office by Her Majesty's inspectors. Some few years ago I had an opportunity of testing the value of diocesan inspection, and I found that in the case of schools subject to Government inspection the returns made by the Government inspectors and by the diocesan inspectors were almost identical; and the conclusion I drew from that fact was that I might safely take the returns of the diocesan inspectors respecting schools not under Government inspection as reliable. Before I sit down I must venture to express my surprise at the observation of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that education had done nothing, and could do nothing to diminish crime. If that be the case surely we are spending our money upon education to no good end. Statistics may, undoubtedly, show that the noble Marquess is perfectly right in stating that the increase in crime has kept pace with that of education; but it has yet to be shown that those who form the criminal classes are recruited from among those who are educated in our schools. On the contrary, I believe, it has been shown that a large proportion of those found in our gaols either have been in no school at all, or have been at school for so short a time that the amount of education they have received is almost nil. No doubt, some particular branches of crime may be fostered by education—that is to say, education puts into the hands of an unprincipled man an instrument which he can use for the purpose of fraud; but that is not the case with crime in general, and, therefore, I must make my humble protest against the doctrine that there is no connection between education and the diminution of crime.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he was glad to hear that, although it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure upon the subject of education during the present Session, it was not because they undervalued the importance or the pressing nature of the subject. With reference to the statement of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that crime had not diminished with the spread of education, he might say that, in his opinion, if education were limited to merely teaching the mechanical processes of reading and writing, the effect would be rather to increase than diminish crime; but if to that mechanical teaching they added moral training, the result would be widely different and of a most beneficial character.

LORD BELPER said, he wished to draw their Lordships' attention to a point which was of great importance, although it had not been referred to in this discussion. It was true that large sums were munificently subscribed for the purposes of education, and that a great number of children attended our schools; but he feared that the results were not so satisfactory as was generally supposed. He believed the case to be that, of all the children attending these schools, only a small portion derived full benefit from what they had been taught. Too frequently they left the school before they had been well grounded in the rudiments of education, and after a short period they altogether forgot what little knowledge they had acquired, and the money expended upon their education was in a great measure thrown away. Of the children who had actually attended school, he believed it would be found that only a comparatively small proportion of them had learned to read and write well; and he feared that very few of those who were unable to read and write with ease troubled themselves to keep up those arts in after-life. He believed that, in this respect, this country would bear no comparison with such countries as Scotland, Prussia, and Saxony, which had been referred to in this debate. No doubt it was a matter of the utmost importance, and one upon which we had every reason to congratulate ourselves, that vast numbers of children attended school in the present day, and also that such vast sums were raised by private subscription; but it was not less important to discover what results followed from all these efforts, and how far they succeeded in accomplishing the objects which were aimed at. It was notorious that on referring to the calendars of criminals it would be found that by far the larger number of those committing offences were persons who had been imperfectly educated.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, he did not dispute the fact that children too often left school at a very early age, but it was almost impossible they could remain long enough to obtain all the advantages which were desirable. The education question was mixed up with the labour question, and a time arrived when parents naturally required the assistance of their children in earning a livelihood for the family. At the same time, he was bound to say that in the districts with which he was best acquainted there was an anxious and growing desire, even on the part of the agricultural population, for the education of their children. In the north of England this was more especially the case. In the south of England, wages, generally speaking, were not equally high, though they had increased of late years very much. A great desire for education also existed in this part of the country; but undoubtedly it too often happened that as soon as the children were old enough to earn money they were taken from school. The cause of education was thus injured by the state of the labour market. With regard to some of the countries mentioned by his noble Friend (Earl Russell), he rather doubted whether education was as perfect in them as had been suggested. In France, for instance, he knew that the same objection as to children leaving at too early an age was very general. In the ordinary course of things, children at a certain age must come, by their labour, in aid of the wages of their parents; and he knew of no mode by which, short of a much greater interference with labour than our present system warranted, their pecuniary need could be reconciled with the requirements of education. Education would not extinguish crime, but at least it altered its character. Persons of education from time to time committed grave crimes, undoubtedly; but crimes of the gravest class were less frequent among persons of education. This could be learnt, for instance, from the experience of the mining districts. The pitmen were, from various circumstances, a class in which education was very backward, and crimes of violence were common among them; but among persons of a better class such crimes were comparatively rare. He felt that, both as regarded the system of compulsory rating for educational purposes, and that depending mainly upon voluntary effort, which now existed, there were many circumstances requisite to be borne in mind. The clergy made great exertions in the cause of education, and frequently, in the absence of resident landlords, were called upon to make good deficiencies, and to meet claims which their own means ill enabled them to support. At the same time they would doubtless prefer to continue such sacrifices rather than resort to a system of purely secular education, which must follow the adoption of a system of rating. In whatever light the subject was looked at it was surrounded with grave difficulties. Increased facilities for education were undoubtedly required, and, whatever system was ultimately agreed upon, it was desirable to adopt something like uniformity. He, therefore, hoped that Her Majesty's Government, before committing themselves and the country to any course which must seriously affect the future of education in this country, would leave the question open for consideration and allow the whole matter to be fully and fairly discussed.

BRAZILIAN SLAVE TRADE BILL.

(NO. 14.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."—(The Earl of Clarendon.)

LORD CHELMSFORD: I very much regret that I was not in the House on Thursday evening last, when the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs took occasion to make some observations upon a statement made by me in the debate upon the second reading of the Bill, to the effect that I had not been consulted by the Government of the day previously to the adoption of the Act of 1845. I had not the slightest notion that it was the intention of the noble Earl to make any observations whatever upon that statement, or I certainly should have been in my place in the House. The noble Earl has said that as I was so constant in attendance he took it for granted that I should be present on the evening when he called my conduct in question. My Lords, I am quite sure that was the reason which induced the noble Earl not to give me the customary notice; but I cannot help thinking that, when the noble Earl came down and found that I was not in the House, as the matter was not pressing, and as there could have been no inconvenience in postponing his observations to the following evening, he might, in courtesy, have done so upon this occasion. I will go a little further. The noble Earl had found in the Foreign Office an opinion of mine, given by me when I was a Solicitor General, in conjunction with Sir John Dodson, the Queen's Advocate, and Sir William Follett, then Attorney General, on the Brazilian Treaty. That document convinced the noble Earl that I was inaccurate in the statements I made. I can hardly think that the noble Earl could have attributed to me any intentional mis-statement. [The Earl of CLARENDON: Hear, hear!] He might have thought that it arose from a failure of memory, and it would have only been consistent with the character of the noble Earl if he had sent me a line to say that I was under a mistake as to what had happened twenty-three years ago, for he had found an opinion which I had given at that time upon the subject. I can assure him that if he had done so I would have come down immediately and expressed my sense of obligation to the noble Earl, and I should have, of course, admitted that I was inaccurate in the statement I had made. I do not know that there was anything which I said upon the second reading of the Bill, which should induce the noble Earl to treat me—I will not say with intentional discourtesy—but, at all events, in so unusual a manner. The present Government had nothing to do with the Act of 1845, and the present Bill is introduced for the purpose of repealing it. Whatever my opinion might originally have been, I examined very carefully, before the discussion upon the second reading of the Bill, the treaties with Portugal, and the treaty with Brazil of 1826, and I have conscientiously come to the conclusion that that Act ought never to have passed. The difference between the noble Earl and myself was that he proposed the repeal of the Act because it had done its duty in suppressing the slave trade, while

I, on the contrary, having re-examined the matter, changed my opinion and came to the conclusion that the repeal of the Act was proper because it ought never to have been passed. I have merely risen to state that I had utterly forgotten the fact of my having been consulted as to the treaty and having given an opinion twenty-three years ago. I regret very much the inaccuracy of my statement, and still more that it should have placed the noble Earl under the necessity of making personal observations upon me during my absence.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: I can assure the noble and learned Lord that there was not the slightest intentional disrespect on my part in the observations I made on the previous evenings. What I said was that the noble and learned Lord was one of the most constant in his attendance in this House, and that it did not occur to me that I should not find him in his place when the Bill went through Committee. If it had occurred to me that he would not have been present I should have sent him the notice that he had a right to expect. Perhaps I ought not to have made that statement in his absence. If in any respect I was deficient in courtesy to the noble and learned Lord I must express my regret; but I must say that I very much desired to remove the impression that, I believe, would prevail, and which I know did prevail in some quarters, that the noble and learned Lord, having been a Law Officer of the Government who introduced this Bill, had not been consulted with respect to this measure. I listened with very great respect to the speeches of the noble and learned Lord, and the other noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns), because they analyzed and pulled to pieces a Bill that was about to repeal an Act of Parliament, upon the ground that it was unjust and harsh, and that the Government and the country had no right to pass it. In fact, they used all the arguments which the Brazilian Government were in the habit of using against that treaty. The tendency of such a course must be to revive bad feelings and old animosities. Their opinions, coming from lawyers who have held such high offices, of course command great respect, both at home and abroad, and they would not only revive animosities in Brazil, but claims against Her Majesty's Government that can never be recognized. With regard to the noble and learned Lord's defect of memory, I must add that in 1849, when the noble and learned Lord was free and unfettered from office, a Bill was brought in by Mr. Milner Gibson to repeal the Act of 1845. The noble and learned Lord was not only in the majority against the Bill, but he took the lead in opposing it, and an hon. Member who was present told me that so well did the noble and learned Lord defend the Act itself and the principle on which it was founded, that although Lord Palmerston and Sir Robert Peel followed in the debate, they could say nothing new, and the opponents of the Bill concentrated their efforts in attempting to answer the noble and learned Lord. I have not been able to refer to that speech of the noble and learned Lord; but I have no doubt I should find in it an ample refutation of the speech which the noble and learned Lord delivered the other night. The noble and learned Lord the Leader of the Opposition (Lord Cairns), treated the production by me of the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as a breach of confidence almost without precedent. I did not quote the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown—I merely read an abstract of that opinion, such as we are in the habit of making at the Foreign Office of the confidential despatches which are laid before Parliament. I brought with me the correct copy of the opinion of the noble and learned Lord and the other Law Officers of the Crown, that he might test its accuracy. There are certainly precedents to be found for producing the opinions themselves. An Address was moved by Lord Malmesbury for copies of any Papers or opinions relative to the assessment of claims of compensation against the Government of Brazil. Another case still more recent can be quoted in reference to the Hyde Park riots, in May, 1867, when my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), then at the head of the Government, not only produced the opinion of the Law Officers of his own Government, but also those of a former Government. The public mind was then much agitated, and it was a matter of importance to show on what grounds the Government had proceeded, and what was the state of the law, and my noble Friend took a most authentic means of putting the public in possession of that which it was most desirable should be known. One of the opinions then produced was signed by Sir Hugh Cairns, and it was read before the noble and learned Lord, then a Member of this House, without any opposition being raised on his part to the proceeding. A precedent was thus established for reading the opinion of a Law Officer of the Crown verbatim, which is what I did not do.

LORD CAIRNS: I rise in consequence of the remark just made by the noble Earl. I stated the other day that I remembered one instance in which a general rule had been departed from on very special grounds, but at the time the rule was departed from a protest was entered against its being brought forward as a precedent. I recollect that in the much disputed case of the claims made with reference to the steamer Cagliari the Law Officers of two successive Governments differed in opinion, and the Law Officers of the second Government were not even unanimous. On that very special and peculiar ground the House of Commons asked for the opinions of the Law Officers, and they were laid before it. Of all cases in which I should have thought it improper to depart from the general rule that the opinions of Law Officers are sacred, I should have thought that case the strongest where you wish, not to establish some question of general interest, but to found a personal charge against one of the Law Officers of the Crown who signed the opinion.

EARL GRANVILLE: I think the noble and learned Lord has made a mistake in supposing that the noble Earl brought this matter forward the other day with any personal motive. As a discussion may arise between the Brazilian Government and this country it was desirable that the Brazilian Government should not be led into the belief that the Government of this country had not acted upon legal advice of an imperfect character. The other day the noble and learned Lord had gone away, or I should have ventured to remonstrate with him for stating that words which fell from him were unimportant. I think it can hardly be considered that words used by a noble and learned Lord, holding the position of ex-Lord Chancellor, are unimportant; on the contrary, they are regarded as of the greatest possible importance. He stated on that occasion that there had never been but one precedent of the communication to Parliament of the opinions of Law Officers, and that was protested against. Three such instances have been quoted this evening. The noble and learned Lord now draws a distinction between opinions on national and opinions on international questions; but he did not give us the slightest hint the other day of any such distinction. However, I remonstrate against the doctrine that words falling from him can be of little or no importance.

LORD CAIRNS: The noble Earl says he would have remonstrated the other day, but that I had left the House, and to-night he has adopted a course which comes exactly to the same thing, for I have already spoken in this debate, and therefore am not able to reply without violating the rules of debate in your Lordships' House.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^d accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

A Bill intituled an Act to amend the Contagious Diseases Act, 1866—Was presented by The Marquess TOWNSHEND; read 1^a. (No. 29.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 8th March, 1869.

Resolutions [March 5] reported—SUPPLEMENTARY GRANTS—CIVIL SERVICE; POST OFFICE PACKET SERVICE.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Municipal Corporations (Metropolis)* [39]; Corporation of London* [40].

Second Reading—Metropolitan Commons Supplemental* [30]; Inclosure of Lands* [31].

IRELAND—INSPECTORS OF FISHERIES. QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the opinion of the Law Officers of Ireland has been taken as to the legality of the Warrant appointing Major Hayes and Mr. Brady Inspectors of Fisheries; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay a Copy of that opinion upon the Table of the House; whether the Commission under which Mr. Lane, Q.C., and the other Fishery Commissioners sat, has been revoked or cancelled; and, if so, when; and, if there is any objection to lay upon the Table of the House any Correspondence that has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the late Fishery Commissioners on the subject?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. SULLIVAN) in reply, said, that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland as to the legality of the Warrant appointing Major Hayes and Mr. Brady Inspectors of Fisheries, had been taken, but it was not usual to lay a copy of an opinion of the Law Officers on the table. However, as it had been communicated to Major Hayes and Mr. Brady, he had no objection to state the substance of it which was that the appointment was illegal and invalid, and he might add that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in England, which had also been taken on the subject, was substantially the same. The Commission under which Mr. Lane, Q.C., and the other Fishery Commissioners sat had been revoked under Royal Sign Manual, dated the 30th of January of the present year. There was no objection to lay on the table the correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the late Fishery Commission on the subject.

NAVY—SLAVE TRADE, WEST COAST OF AFRICA—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HUTT said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government propose to maintain any naval force on the West Coast of Africa, for the purpose of suppressing the Slave Trade?

MR. GLADSTONE: I can give my right hon. Friend an answer that I hope will be satisfactory to him, in reference to his inquiry on a matter in which he has taken so active and distinguished a part. Of course, we speak now of the West Coast of Africa exclusively, and I must be understood to say nothing which would prevent Her Majesty's Government from keeping some limited force upon that coast if we thought it necessary for purposes of trade. Subject to these two limitations, I can assure him that the squadron has been reduced, and that the matter is under consideration now with the view and with the hope of its entire withdrawal.

IRELAND—THE LATE CITY OF DUBLIN ELECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he would beg to ask the Post Master General, Whether, previous to the late Election for the city of Dublin, any—and, if any, which—of the Candidates for that city canvassed, with the consent and permission of the Post Office Authorities in Dublin, the officials of that department in the public offices, and during office hours; and, if so, whether such Candidate or Candidates were accompanied in their canvass by any official of the department; and, if the preceding Question be answered in the affirmative, what official is responsible for what has occurred; and, to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether any—and, if any, which—of the same Candidates visited the Custom House in Dublin during business hours, and there canvassed the persons employed in the Civil Service; and, if so, whether he was accompanied by any of the superior officials, or whether such canvass was conducted in those public offices in the presence of the superior officials?

MR. AYRTON said, that in the absence of his noble Friend, the Postmaster General, he would give his hon. Friend an explanation, and the best way to do that would be to read an exact statement of what had occurred, which the Government had received from the authorities in Dublin. It was as follows:—

“Previous to the late election for the City of Dublin, one of the candidates for that city did, with the consent of the Post Office authorities in Dublin, canvass the officials of that department in the public offices and during the office hours. The particular candidate who did so was Sir Arthur Guinness, and he was accompanied in his canvass by an official of the department, and the official who is responsible for what occurred on that occasion is the Secretary to the Post Office in Ireland. So soon as this came to the ears of the then Postmaster General, the Duke of Montrose, he at once expressed his disapprobation at the proceeding, and caused a general circular to be issued throughout the United Kingdom, warning officers of the department against allowing canvassing to take place in the Post Office buildings.”

With reference to what had occurred in the Custom House, he had received the following statement:—

"Sir Arthur Guinness and Mr. Plunkett, with the private secretary of the former gentleman, called at my office previous to the election to request my vote, and Sir Arthur asked if I had any objection to his requesting other officers for their votes, and if I would introduce him to them. I replied that he was at liberty to request the vote of any officer, but I declined to introduce him or in any way interfere with the free exercise of the votes of the officers under me. My attention having been called a day or two afterwards to a paragraph in a local newspaper to the effect that the officers had been canvassed in the Custom House and in the Post Office during business hours, attended by a superior officer, I made inquiries so far as my department was concerned, when I learnt that Sir Arthur Guinness had, accompanied only by his private secretary, asked the votes of four clerks at their respective desks in the Long Room, and that of the surveyor in his office, which did not occupy more than a few minutes. From my inquiries now I believe this is the extent of the canvass referred to as having occurred in the Custom House, and I am satisfied that none of the superior officers accompanied any candidate in canvassing the officers, or in any way influenced the free exercise of their votes. I have, also, no reason to suppose that the restrictions conveyed in the General Order 107, 1868, have been in any way neglected by the officers."

That was signed by Mr. Trevor, collector.

THE DEANERY OF LICHFIELD AND RECTORY OF TATENHILL. QUESTION.

MR. M. A. BASS said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for North Devonshire (Mr. Acland), Whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recognize the appointment of the Dean of Lichfield to the Rectory of Tatenhill; whether they have taken the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject; if so, whether he has any objection to state that opinion; and, whether the patronage of the Living of Tatenhill, of which the Duchy of Lancaster was deprived by the Act 5th of Anne, is not restored to the Crown by virtue of the Act 3rd and 4th Vic. c. 113; whether the Commissioners contemplate any new Legislation in this matter; and, what is the revenue of the Deanery of Lichfield apart from the Living of Tatenhill, now producing about £2,000 per annum?

MR. ACLAND said, that, in reply, he must ask permission of the House to make a short statement, in order that the purport of the answer might be fully understood. Tatenhill was distant from Lichfield about ten miles, its population was 3,000, its income about £1,800 a year, of which there had been hitherto paid
